Attention Cities — Heads Up On Solid Waste!

by Sharon Rollins and Leslie Shechter
MTAS Consultants

Time is running out to finalize regional solid waste plans, due to the state on June 30. Make sure your city's interests are represented!

Who Is Responsible?

The Solid Waste Management Act of 1991 assigned the responsibility to form solid waste regions to counties — and many regions have turned out to be single-county regions. Each region must develop a plan that:

1. ensures a 10-year disposal capacity and
2. shows how it will accomplish a 25-percent reduction in the amount of solid waste entering its landfills and incinerators.

These plans are due to the Tennessee Department of Environment and Conservation's Division of Solid Waste Assistance by June 30. Although they are being developed for regional solid waste boards, cities need to be familiar with the plans. They may impact YOU more than you counted on. First, be sure you get a copy of the plan, preferably while it's still in draft form. Review it carefully.

What To Look For

Check to see if your city's interests are represented in the following areas:

1. Is the cost to implement the solid waste regional plan equitably distributed between city-county and between city-city. Look at short- and long-term costs. Pay particular attention to how the plan will be funded.

While the act requires counties to use special revenue fund accounting for solid waste activities, it doesn't prohibit using property taxes to finance operations. If the only or major source of funding will be countywide property taxes, then cities that will continue to provide collection and/or disposal should make sure their residents aren't subsidizing the county's services as well as paying for city services.

2. Is your city expected to implement a new program in recycling? Public education? Special waste collection? How will it be paid for?
3. Does the plan lock your city into a long-term solution that you can live with? Are options available? What provisions are made for cost control?
4. Cities may have more landscaping and demolition waste than counties. What provisions are made for disposal of this waste?

What If The Plan Falls Short?

Work with the regional solid waste board to get your concerns resolved before the plan is finalized and submitted to the state. If there are unresolved issues or areas of disagreement, put them in writing and make sure the state receives a copy.

Time is running out. Act soon!
