Acknowledgements

No scholastic endeavor has been brought to successful fruition without the contribution of many individuals whose knowledge and support were invaluable. Foremost are the members of my graduate committee: Dr. Walter Klippel, who trusted me to do what I needed to do to complete this work. Very special thanks go to Dr. Susan Frankenberg for her editing of this manuscript, with guidance through the vagaries of the software used to build the computerized inventory, for her knowledge of Mississippian material culture, her expert curatorial abilities and extensive knowledge of the George D. Barnes, Jr. Collection. Special thanks go to Dr. Jefferson Chapman. His extensive knowledge about the Barnes Collection, and his personal and professional support during the period that this thesis was being written were, literally, life saving. This work could not have been completed without any of these experts. I would also like to thank those individuals whose expertise in Southeastern archaeology both assisted and clarified my subject: Dr. Kenneth E. Sassaman, South Carolina Institute of Archaeology and Anthropology, University of South Carolina, Columbia, for providing examples of his work with the Barnes Collection; Dr. Janet Levy, University of North Carolina, Charlotte; Dr. Kevin Smith, Middle Tennessee State University; Dr. Frank Cowan, Cincinnati Museum of Natural History and Science for their insights into working with collections. I would also like to thank Dr. Nancy Parezo, University of Arizona, Tucson, for bibliographical assistance, especially regarding museology and research in and of museums; and Dr. Stephen Cox, Tennessee State Museum, for information about the Thruston Collection, which is curated at Vanderbilt University, Nashville.

I cannot thank enough the many friends, peers, and relatives who supported me financially and emotionally during the writing of this thesis, however, there are a few who necessarily must be acknowledged for support above and beyond the call of duty: Mr. Raymond G. Koerner, who got the whole thing started, Mr. and Mrs. Clarke Slade for their enthusiastic support of the project, Mr. Wendell Barner of ICF Kaiser Engineers, Dr. George Bradley, Duquesne University, and Dr. Richard Scaglion, University of Pittsburgh. Very special thanks go to Mr. Glenn Strickland for his love and encouragement, and to Christian Davenport who encouraged me by example. Kudos to Robert Goodman for enduring graduate school with me. Many thanks to Jolie Liston for reading the last draft. Finally, I cannot express enough gratitude and love to my mother Carol, my father Robert, and my family. No one mentioned has ever questioned whether I would succeed or not, though I often did. It is to all of these individuals that I dedicate this thesis.

Abstract

This thesis addresses the problem of determining the research potential of an archaeological collection held in the public domain by the Frank H. McClung Museum, the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. The collection was purchased in 1949 from the estate of George D. Barnes, Jr., a professional artifact miner who built the collection over the course of two years in the late 1930's. The collection contains over 3500 artifacts from prehistoric Archaic, Woodland, and Mississippian periods, as well as Historic Period artifacts from archaeological sites located primarily in East Tennessee. The collection was built without the benefit of systematic excavation, and little documentation about the context from which these artifacts were recovered exists. This lack of provenience information impacts the overall utility of such a collection when addressing research questions about prehistoric lifeways. However, as archaeological sites available for study disappear, museum collections such as this gain new importance for research.

The collection was physically inventoried, and a database developed in order to facilitate access and manage curation. Past uses of the Barnes Collection, and other similar collections in the Southeast were studied, and the research potential of the Barnes Collection assessed and evaluated. Suggestions for future use and curation were offered.

CHAPTER 1: Introduction

Archaeological museum collections are often made up of large number of objects that have been obtained through private donation or purchase. Sometimes these collections come to the institution documented in systematic ways, to the best of the collector's ability, but more often, they are merely a collection of objects that interested the collector (Coughlin 1991). The question of whether an artifact has "value" to the archaeologist is based on the relevance of the research question posed, or the hypothesis advanced, and the utility of the collection in addressing the question or hypothesis (Kavanagh 1989:126; Pearce 1989). Collections built by antiquarians and private collectors can be quite large and diverse compared to the collection that is built through systematic means. Further, they are built in ways that reflected the collecting regime of the collector over a span of time. Such collections are being viewed far more critically now. These collections are more than large assemblages of like artifacts representing particular cultural periods collected over a geographic area in ways a collector perceived as reflecting a particular culture. Researchers are realizing that the constitution of a sample of the archaeological record represented by such collections can dictate the suitability and utility of that collection for research (Sullivan 1997).

The specimens in a collection, organized in formal way through typology and seriation, could inform interpretation about the cultural traditions found in the region, such as the Mississippian, Woodland, Archaic, and Paleo-Indian periods.

In general, well documented collections become measurable units to augment archaeological research into questions about culture process by providing data to interpret components present at a site, or several sites within a region. A "component" has been defined as the "manifestation of a given archaeological 'focus' at a specific site" (McKern 1939:308), and is considered a unit of classification within a focus. The focus may contain one or several components. Willey and Phillips define a "phase" as the most "practicable and intelligible unit of archaeological study" (Willey and Phillips 1958:22). It is a content unit, and considered a basic unit representing the temporal dimension spatially limited to a small geographic area, such as a site. An "horizon" is defined by Willey and Phillips as a "spatial continuity represented by cultural traits and assemblages whose nature and mode of occurrence permit the assumption of a broad and rapid spread" (Willey and Phillips 1958:33). The classification, or typing, of elements in a collection, applied to these "archaeological units" (Willey and Phillips 1958:12) aid understanding of patterning and variation that characterize culture change across a cultural horizon.

As paradigms change and research designs become more specific, the fundamental data a collection may provide about what "has been" can facilitate a more precise understanding about "what is" (Black 1980:52). Historically, museum collections have been amassed under a variety of collecting strategies, thus, the necessary documentation and specifics about a collection may be lacking. The George D. Barnes Collection at the Frank H. McClung Museum at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville is just such a collection. Comprised of the University of Tennessee, Knoxville is just such a collection. Comprised of over 3500 artifacts, these were collected from prehistoric and historic sites and caves in Tennessee, North Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Arkansas. Unfortunately, methodological documentation regarding the excavation techniques and collecting strategy was not included with the collection.

Sullivan states that the "...research potential of archaeological collections arguably revolves around three general considerations: (1) the project design or plan; (2) the quality of recording and recovery; and (3) the redundancy of information" (Sullivan 1997:9). Sullivan argues that if the potential for future research is limited or nonexistent, there is no justification for curating the collection no matter under what context the collection was formed. This thesis assesses the research potential of the George D. Barnes, Jr. Collection at the University of Tennessee using the criteria developed by Sullivan (1997). This will be achieved by examining the nature and extent of the use of the collection; the quality of provenience information in the two catalog sysems used during accessioning of the collection. Suggestions regarding how the collection can be used in the future to meet its research potential will be offered.

To provide a context in which to evaluate the research potential of the Barnes Collection, this thesis first reviews aspects of museology and the value of museum collections, including examples of research on other poorly provenienced collections in the Southeast. A brief history of the Barnes Collection, its current physical condition, and what the collection has been used for in the past are presented. An evaluation of the Barnes Collection begins with an examination of the type of information available from the Barnes catalog and the museum accession system. This is followed by a discussion of the computerized inventory methodology. Finally, the results of a physical inventory performed by the author, and an assessment of the information derived from the inventory will be used to evaluate the potential of the collection for future archaeological research.

CHAPTER 2: Southeastern Archaeological Museum Collections

Archaeologists use a variety of data to test hypotheses and research questions about prehistory. In the past 100 years, archaeology has become theoretically and methodologically formalized and systematized. This has resulted in well-documented collections that have allowed researchers to address a broad variety of questions relating to aboriginal material culture and the processes of culture change in the prehistoric period in the United States (Christenson 1989; Fitting 1973; Goetz and Mills 1991; Shears 1989). Generally, this has been accomplished through the study of data sets derived from excavations, as controlled excavation of a site can provide information from excavated features that may be used in conjunction with an artifact collection. This method of building collections has become more difficult everywhere in the Southeast, particularly in East Tennessee, as prehistoric archaeological sites here are finite. Many of the sites in East Tennessee and the Southeast either have been investigated, or are unavailable for investigation. The utility of private collections to augment current field research is growing as excavation of new material slows (Dr. Kenneth E. Sassaman of the South Carolina Institute of Archaeology and Anthropology to Wendy L. Tolleson, letter, 19 October 1997).

This has necessarily led to other approaches to archaeological research; that of the study of archaeological collections housed in museums. Though not a new methodology, the limited number of sites available for research has necessitated an increase in material culture studies based on such archaeological collections. These collections range from collections assembled early in the 19th century by ethnographic expeditions sponsored by museums, to collections built in the late 19th century by antiquarian collectors who had an interest in that region or aboriginal group, to those built during the early to middle 20th century by professional or amateur collectors. Many of these collections are poorly documented and remain unstudied.

In the early to middle 19th century, land survey was performed in the Southeast along the drainages of the Tennessee River, the Ohio River, and the Green River (Haywood 1823; Squier and Davis 1848; Thomas 1887, 1890; Troost 1845). Explorers reported large mound complexes purported to be built by the "mound builder" culture (Willey and Sabloff 1980; Silverberg 1968). Parts of these mounds were excavated, and some scientific studies of aboriginal remains were attempted in a search to identify their origin (Glenn 1910; Hrdlicka 1907; Jones 1876; McGaw 1965).

Toward the end of the 19th century, many sites in the Southeast were investigated by archaeologists and collectors who collected artifacts as a part of the attempt to discover the origins of the peoples who made them (Holmes 1883,1903; Thomas 1894; Moore 1915; Moorehead 1910,1917; Thruston 1890; Peet 1892). The records of their investigations do not reflect the rigorous methodology of modern archaeological work, particularly in the case of the artifact collectors; however, these collections stand as some of the first documentary evidence of the Southeast's prehistory. In some cases, they are the best examples available for study. The late 19th century collectors tended to concentrate on collecting unusual or artistic curios resulting in collections containing some of the most spectacular examples of material culture (Moorehead 1910, 1917).

Between 1870-1899, collecting expeditions were sponsored by large institutions such as the Smithsonian Institution's Bureau of Ethnology (Hinsley 1992). These expeditions resulted in large, well-provenienced collections, forming the basis for most museum exhibits at that time about prehistoric and early historic aboriginal cultures in North America. Most of these expeditions concentrated in the Northwest and Southwest, collecting from Native American groups who, it was thought, represented modern remnants of prehistoric cultures. However, where aboriginal cultures were perceived to be extinct, it was believed that these groups could only be brought to life through excavations, and through the direct historical approach: identifying analogous cultures to which the extinct cultures could be compared. Artifact collections were used in comparisons to identify similarities between historical groups and extinct cultures.

The focus on research using museum collections has been labeled "museum anthropology" (Thompson and Parezo 1989:C-19) and concentrates on answering questions about cultural processes through the study of collections. Museum anthropology emphasizes concentrating on the research contributions that older collections can provide archaeological researchers and other anthropological specialists such as ethnologists (Parezo 1987) to hypothesize and develop new interpretations within new theoretical paradigms, or to reinterpret earlier conclusions. The contribution of research performed on these collections is just beginning, as many collections have not been inventoried in ways that make them accessible to researchers (Shears 1989).

The importance of old collections to anthropology and archaeology, particularly collections built by private collectors and antiquarians, is evident in the requests for funding to organize these materials to facilitate access. In 1986, the Museum of the American Indian in New York submitted a grant proposal to the National Endowment for the Humanities to compile a computer database to organize the documentation for the Hendricks-Hodge Archaeological Expedition Collection (Shears 1989:2). The Hendricks-Hodge Collection is a collection of documents chronicling a late 19th century collecting expedition to the Southwest. In 1989, the Cincinnati Museum of Art submitted a grant proposal to the National Science Foundation to transfer five collections from the Museum of Art to the Cincinnati Museum of Natural History, and to properly inventory and curate them (Cowan 1989). The funding was used to purchase specimen cases, acid free containers, tissue and padding to repack the collections, and funds for computerization (Cowan 1989). In 1982, the National Endowment for the Arts funded the incorporation of the Gates P. Thruston Collection, collected in the late 19th century, into the permanent collections at the Tennessee State Museum in Nashville. This collection is an assemblage of artifacts from burial contexts in Middle Tennessee (Cox 1985).

The George D. Barnes, Jr. Collection, housed at the Frank H. McClung Museum, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, is another old collection with potential for archaeological study. Mr. Barnes built the collection by systematically "mining" sites in the Southeast for artifacts, concentrating on the East Tennessee region (Dr. Jefferson Chapman, personal communication 1998). The collection includes many objects made from trade, or non-local, materials, such as native copper and marine shell beads, or objects considered by the collector to be finely made. Many of these objects were found in burials located in mounds. Consisting of over 3500 artifacts, the collection represents all the prehistoric culture periods as well as the Historic Period. The Barnes Collection has variable provenience documentation ranging from none to the level of site, county, or state. The collection has been relatively unused over the past 50 years due to its poor provenience and a general lack of knowledge of the collection's existence outside of the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. Thus, its potential for research has heretofore been unassessed, with the exception of Lewis and Kneberg, who recognized the collections potential and studied the historic materials.

The Value of Historic Collections

> "Today, material culture studies are alive and well in anthropology, not as simplistic technological descriptions and analyses, but rather as productive methods of gaining insight into the processes of culture...Anthropological interest in material culture studies is definitely on the rise, and some would even suggest that they constitute a "new" anthropological specialization" (Thompson and Parezo 1989: C-19, C-20).

Most collections built by antiquarians and other collectors have been used primarily for exhibits and public education due to the lack of systematic excavation, pertinent contextual site data and other documentation. This situation is beginning to change. Studies using historic collections have aided in the clarification of the phases of the Mississippian Period (Chapman 1988; Hatch 1974; Lewis and Kneberg 1947, 1958; Polhemus 1987; Smith 1992) where new information from sites is lacking. For example, Dr. Kevin Smith used artifacts from the Gates P. Thruston Collection in Nashville, Tennessee, to help define the Thruston Phase of the Late Mississippian Period for the Middle Cumberland region in Tennessee (Smith 1992). Comparisons between these Thruston Phase artifacts from the Thruston Collection and the Barnes Collection artifacts have not been pursued. However, a comparison between the two collections could reveal similarities in the material culture between Middle Cumberland Mississippian peoples and other Mississippian groups from East Tennessee. For example, two unusual artifacts that Smith used as markers for the Thruston Phase, a chipped stone mace and a red catlinite pipe, are similar to two artifacts in the Barnes Collection. The number of artifacts, the variation in manufacture and material type, and other attributes could be used to explore whether the Thruston Phase was more geographically wide spread outside Middle Tennessee as part of a larger Late Mississippian Period manifestation in the Southeast, or a the result of interaction between Mississippian groups in the region.

Other Collections in the Southeast

There are other collections of artifacts built by 19th and 20th century non-archaeologists similar to the Barnes Collection housed in institutions in the Southeast. Many have not been assessed for their research potential, or made accessible to researchers. Some of these collections possess limited contextual or provenience information, and others have been inaccessible in the past because they have not been properly curated or inventoried.

To locate some of these, a questionnaire was developed to survey a small sample of museums in the Southeast for collections similar to the Barnes Collection. Institutions were chosen based on two criteria: 1) they were located in the Southeast, or possessed Southeastern archaeological collections, or 2) the curators were known to the Director of the McClung Museum. Of five Southeastern institutions contacted, four responded. They were the Cincinnati Museum of Natural History, the South Carolina Institute of Archaeology and Anthropology in Savannah, which is affiliated with the University of South Carolina in Columbia, the University of North Carolina in Charlotte, and the Tennessee State Museum in Nashville, Tennessee. The purpose of the questionnaire was to identify and define collections of at least 100 Southeast archaeological artifacts housed in each of these institutions. Curators were asked to describe the type of collections, the kinds of artifacts present in each collection, the time and cultural periods covered by each collection, the level of provenience for each collection, and whether or not these collections had been used for research, exhibition purposes, loans, or other purposes. An example of the questionnaire sent to all institutions is shown in Figure 1.

The Survey Results

Each institution that returned the questionnaire houses at least two collections built by private collectors or antiquarians. These collections are summarized in Table 1 and briefly described below. The table includes the name of the institution, the name (if any) of the collection, the date the collection was donated to the institution, and the cultural periods, number and types of artifacts, previous use, and publications for each collection.

From this very small sample, it is apparent that there are private archaeological collections, both small and large, that could be or are, available for research. The results of research on these collections could be used to augment research results of collections from excavated sites. For example, a large collection of prehistoric and historic artifacts from the Madisonville Site in Ohio is curated at the Cincinnati Museum of Natural History. This well-provenienced collection consists of approximately 50 ceramic vessels, and several thousand smaller artifacts that can be specifically linked to one relatively small portion of the site. The Cincinnati Museum of Natural History also holds large poorly provenienced collections donated by a group of antiquarian collectors who worked the site in the late 19th century.

The Cincinnati Museum of Natural History Collections

In 1989, the Cincinnati Art Museum de-accessioned 45,000 artifacts housed in the Cincinnati Museum of Art in order to move them to the Cincinnati Museum of Natural History. According to the project summary, many of the artifacts were from four collections built during the 19th century. During the period that the collections were held by the Art Museum, little research had been conducted on them. Two of the collections span eastern North America, but consist primarily of objects from Southwestern Ohio and the Middle Ohio Valley. There is also a collection of prehistoric ceramics from Arkansas, and a collection of prehistoric shell objects from East Tennessee. The four collections are the Thomas Cleneay Collection, the C. W. Riggs Collection, the Madisonville Site Collection, and the Dorfuelle Collection (Cowan 1989: 6-9).

The Thomas Cleaney Collection

At his death in 1887, Thomas Cleaney donated a collection of 20,000 lithic artifacts. The collection encompasses the Adena and other prehistoric periods in Ohio. It is the largest collection at the Cincinnati Museum of Natural History. Though it has the least site provenience information, it is possible to assign a number of artifacts to the state and county level. The large sample of chipped stone tools in this collection makes it ideal for examining patterns of stylistic variability within tool categories, and for raw material sourcing studies (Cowan 1989: 10).

The C. W. Riggs Collection

Beginning in 1888, Captain C. W. Riggs used the Art Museum as a repository for his collection of Mississippian pottery acquired in Arkansas. Even after extensive buying and selling by Riggs over the years, the collection still has 650 complete specimens. The collection is provenienced to the state and county level. Brose (1980) related the history of the C. W. Riggs Collection, and though it is one of the significant collections of the Art Museum holdings, no research has been conducted. This is partially the result of its anonymity to archaeological researchers. The combination of this collection with another Riggs collection at the Buffalo Museum of Science creates a collection totaling 2000 ceramic vessels that could be used for study (Cowan 1989:10). A large percentage of the artifacts represent the poorly known Armorel Phase, a Proto-Historic phase when Central Mississippi Valley aboriginal societies were reacting to the collapse of traditional sociopolitical systems, and reeling from population loss by introduced diseases (Williams 1980). The collection has been assessed as being an important record of changes from traditional ceramic motifs to new styles (Cowan 1989: 10).

The Madisonville Site Collections

Collection of the Madisonville Site in Ohio began in 1877, with a group of antiquarians who called themselves the Scientific and Literary Society. However, by 1880, Harvard's Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology had taken over the excavations of this site. The antiquarians donated their private collections to the museum, resulting in a collection of 50 ceramic vessels and several thousand bone tools and pipes. The collection is provenienced to the site level. The Madisonville Site Collection contains Proto-Historic artifacts that have not been examined by specialists in artifact types of this period. These artifacts include a copper or brass hawk bell, and several iron adzes and chisels. The research potential for this collection lies in the information about the site that each collection can provide singly and combined. Additionally, the combination of antiquarian collections with the well-provenienced data provided by the Peabody Museum excavations and the 1987-88 salvage excavations, provides a good starting point for understanding the presence of the Proto-Historic artifacts. This could enhance the understanding of the interactions between this aboriginal society and the encroaching Europeans (Cowan 1989: 11).

The Dorfuelle Collection

The Dorfuelle Collection consists of the earliest curated specimens west of the Allegheny Mountains (Cowan 1989: 8). Exhibited by Mr. John P. Ohmer in Cincinnati at a zoological garden, the "Dorfuelle's Museum" label is in reference to the Western Museum, one of the first natural history museums in the United States. The museum was founded in 1818 but closed in 1823. The collection has no provenience data, but does contain the Waverly Tablet, an Adena depiction of a raptorial bird that has been illustrated in publications but has never been available for study. The reason for this lack of availability is unknown to curators (Cowan 1989: 9). The remainder of the Dorfuelle Collection has never been studied, and Shine and Meyer (1976) provide primarily an historical account of the museum. This is a collection that may benefit from exposure to researchers. Again, Cowan (1989) states that the primary reason the collections have not been examined, or used in research, is that the they are largely unknown to researchers.

The South Carolina Institute of Archaeology and Anthropology (SCIAA) Collections

The South Carolina Institute of Archaeology and Anthropology (SCIAA) in Savannah, South Carolina, houses a number of donated collections, both small and large, ranging from Paleo-Indian Period to Mississippian Period artifacts.

The Hitchcock-Woods Collection

The Hitchcock-Woods Collection consists of thousands of artifacts from 20 sites in a wooded preserve in Aiken, South Carolina. Donated in 1992 by a local citizen, the Archaic Period component of this collection has been used for specialized analysis, including the dating of soot from soapstone vessels. The collection will soon be analyzed for temporal affiliation and techno-functional attributes, and will figure prominently in an upcoming treatise on Stallings prehistory (Dr. Kenneth Sassaman, personal communication, 1997).

The Crosby Bay Collection

The Crosby Bay Collection consists of 2800 artifacts from a Carolina bay site in Aiken, South Carolina. A bay site is an upland pond or wetland located in the Coastal Plain province of South Carolina (Eberhard et. al. 1994). The collection was donated in 1993, and consists primarily of Paleo-Indian Period artifacts, with a minor percentage covering other prehistoric periods. The provenience information is good; all artifacts were surface collected from the site.

The collection has been analyzed, with research conducted on techno-functional attributes, and for comparative purposes (Eberhard et. al.1994).

The Heard Robertson Collection

The Heard Robertson Collection consists of 250 artifacts alleged to have been procured from Stalling Island, Georgia (Sassaman and Lewis 1990). Donated in 1989 by Thomas Robertson, the provenience is questionable. The collection has been analyzed and reported (Sassaman and Lewis 1990), however the research potential is limited due to its questionable provenience. Future researchers could address use-wear and provide valuable information regarding the relationship between form and function (Sassaman and Lewis 1990).

The Bates Hill Road (38AK703) Collection

The Bates Hill Road (38AK703) Collection is a small assemblage of 227 Early Archaic Period artifacts. Donated by a local citizen in 1995, the collection has been used for techno-functional and comparative purposes to examine Early Archaic land use patterns involving a seasonal round of settlement mobility encompassing the entire district of the Savannah River Valley from the ocean to the mountains (DeBiase et al. 1995).

The Chew Mill and Strange Site Collection

The Chew Mill and Strange Site Collection consists of approximately 2000 Late Archaic Period sherds from two shell-midden sites on the Ogeechee River in Georgia. This collection was analyzed for techno-functional attributes in order to address cultural diversity in preferences for making pottery (Dr. Kenneth Sassaman, personal communication, 1997). A comparison to Late Stallings River Culture was also conducted to determine if the ceramic vessels in the collections were stylistically distinct from coastal Stallings River culture (Sassaman et al 1995).

The Moody Site (38ED31) Collection

The Moody Site (38ED31) Collection consists of a large number of Late Archaic artifacts donated by a collector in the 1980s. The collection contains artifacts with provenience data related to excavations conducted by the collector (Dr. Kenneth Sassaman, personal communication, 1997). Research related to specialized soapstone cooking stones and bannerstones was conducted to examine change in cooking technology in the Savannah River Valley (Sassaman 1993).

The Wiles and Strong Collection

In addition to the collections and research already mentioned, the SCIAA has other collections on which research is just beginning. The Wiles and Strong Collections are just two of them, and SCIAA has "many, many more" (Dr. Kenneth Sassaman to Wendy Tolleson, letter, Oct. 19, 1997). The Wiles Collection is a recent acquisition of tens of thousands of prehistoric artifacts from Abbeville County, South Carolina. The collection has been used in comparative research, but the research potential is excellent (Sassaman 1996). The Strong Collection is an assemblage of thousands of lithic tools primarily from the Archaic Period in South Carolina. Provenience data is to the county level, and from a particular context (e.g., surface collection). This collection will soon be used to research Middle Archaic lanceolate points in an effort to define a new type series for the Allendale County, South Carolina area (Dr. Kenneth Sassaman, personal communication, 1997).

The University of North Carolina Collections

The University of North Carolina in Charlotte, North Carolina curates two un-named collections in excess of 100 items. The first collection was donated in 1982, and consists of artifacts from the Late Woodland Period. It carries no provenience data, and has never been studied though specimens have been used for education and exhibition. The second collection was donated in 1985 and consists of predominantly Archaic and Woodland Period artifacts. This collection carries provenience data to the site level. The collection has been used for exhibition, undergraduate research, and has the potential to support research for a graduate thesis (Dr. Janet Levy, personal communication, 1997).

The Tennessee State Museum Collections

Four collections are curated at the Tennessee State Museum, Nashville, Tennessee; the State of Tennessee Collection, the Gates P. Thruston Collection amassed by antiquarian collector and businessman Gates P. Thruston, the Tennessee Historical Society Collection, a collection which is still being built, and the William G. Polk Collection donated in 1981.

The State of Tennessee Collection

The questionnaire reveals that the first collection, the State of Tennessee Collection, started in 1937 and continues to be added to through the present. The collection covers all prehistoric cultural periods up through the Historic Period. According to the questionnaire provenience data is scarce, and the collection has been used for loan and exhibition purposes. It is unknown how many artifacts actually make up the collection.

The Tennessee Historical Society Collection

The Tennessee Historical Society began collecting in 1820 and continues to this day. Again, provenience data is scarce, with state and county level only for some artifacts. According to the questionnaire, the source of the artifacts is unknown, but the collection covers all the prehistoric cultural periods in Tennessee, up through the Historic Period. It has been used primarily for exhibition and loan purposes.

The Gates P. Thruston Collection

The Gates P. Thruston Collection is the third, and probably best known, collection. The collection carries provenience data to the state, county, and site level. Consisting of several thousand artifacts from the "stone grave people," of the Late Woodland and Mississippian Periods (Cox 1985: 41), it has been used for regional analysis of Middle Cumberland prehistoric societies, specifically to define the Thruston Phase in the Late Mississippian Period (Smith 1992). Smith's dissertation represents a synthesis of archaeological data for the Middle Tennessee region, including historic collections, characterizing a 200-year span during the Late Mississippian Period. Smith concluded that the distribution of grave goods from Middle Cumberland sites suggested that the Mississippian peoples of this region were largely egalitarian, with particular artifacts linked to achieved status and ranked lineages within the society (Smith 1992:454-460). Village corporate lineages were the norm rather than the exception, with only small segments of the population reaching achieved status during life. These highest-ranking lineages were affiliated with ceremonial mound centers. He concludes a truncated evolution of Mississippian society in this region that differed from the rest of the Mississippian Sphere recognized for the Southeast (Smith 1992).

The William G. Polk Collection

The last collection is the William G. Polk Collection donated to the museum in 1981. Again, this collection carries only state and county provenience information for a select few items, but covers all the prehistoric periods up through the Historic Period. This collection has been used primarily for loan and exhibition.

CHAPTER 3: The George D. Barnes, Jr. Collection

This chapter presents a brief history about how the Barnes Collection was assembled and exhibited by Mr. Barnes. Letters referenced are from the correspondence files at the Frank H. McClung Museum, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and from the manuscript M.S. 19 archived in the Special Collections Library at the Hodges Library, University of Tennessee, Knoxville. Other information about Mr. Barnes is taken from newspaper articles from regional newspapers including the Chattanooga Times, the Knoxville Journal, the Knoxville News-Sentinel, and the Nashville Banner. Where available, the page numbers in the newspaper articles have been provided.

The Collector

George D. Barnes, Jr. collected throughout his life, beginning at an early age when he accompanied his father, George D. Barnes, Sr., to collect mound sites in the Chattanooga area (Knoxville News-Sentinel [KNS], 29 January, 1933). An avid collector since 1887 (Chattanooga Times [CT], 22 May, 1932:4), Barnes Sr. supplied collections to Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Indiana, Borden University, Borden, Indiana, and Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut (Nashville Banner [NB], 9 August, 1925). Barnes, Jr. developed his first artifact collection in 1896 at the age of 13, and over the course of the next 50 years, built a total of fourteen collections of prehistoric and historic Native American artifacts. Of the first thirteen collections sold to various museums, universities and private individuals, one collection was sold to the Smithsonian Institution and two collections sold in Germany and England respectively ([CT], 22 May, 1932:4). It is Barnes' fourteenth and last collection, owned by Frank H. McClung Museum, University of Tennessee, which is the focus of this thesis.

After selling his thirteenth collection to millionaire Bernard S. Colburn of North Carolina for $12,500, Barnes immediately began excavating and collecting for his fourteenth and final collection. He built the collection in two years, and felt this collection was the finest and most complete, as did others familiar with Southeastern archaeology at that time, such as Dr. F. M. Setzler of the Smithsonian Institution, and Dr. Warren K. Moorhead, of Phillips Academy.

Upon completing this last collection, Mr. Barnes interest turned to collecting historic documents. He felt that "...every Indian mound between Chattanooga and Paducah has been explored, that the whole Cherokee territory has been combed, and that it is improbable that another large collection of Cherokee relics can be made" ([KNS], 29 January, 1933). Along with historic documents, Barnes collected Civil War and Mexican War relics ([CT], 21 January, 1907). A portion of his historic document collection is housed in Special Collections, Hoskins Library, University of Tennessee, Knoxville (MS-19 The Barnes Collection of Historic Documents from Rhea County, Tennessee, Special Collections, University of Tennessee, Knoxville).

As with many collectors whose avocation consumed more time than their profession (Cox 1985), Mr. Barnes was a plumbing contractor whose business provided the income to pursue collecting full time on a large scale. Mr. Barnes had a lifelong interest in Tennessee's prehistoric and historic Indian cultures, and felt that by collecting he was "living with the Indians" ([NB], 9 August, 1925). His expertise landed him a position of field party supervisor in the 1930's during the initial investigations conducted in the Norris Basin by the Tennessee Valley Authority (Lyons 1996:41). Barnes was concerned with making the connection between prehistoric Indian culture and historic Cherokee culture, and to that end, he exhibited the fourteenth collection in Gatlinburg in a museum he had built for that purpose. He felt that the collection should be housed within its "homelands," near the Cherokee Reservation to be viewed by visitors to the Great Smoky Mountain National Park ([KNS], 20 May, 1937).

George D. Barnes, Jr. died July 9, 1947, in Gatlinburg, Tennessee at the age of 64 ([CT], 10 July, 1947:13; [KNS], 10 July, 1947). Between 1930 and his death he attempted to interest a number of local organizations, including the University of Tennessee, in purchasing his collection with the goal of keeping it in Tennessee (H.L. Callahan to Librarian of University of Tennessee, letter, 27 December 1934; T. Levron Howard [TVA] to Judge DeWitt [Court of Appeals], letter, 11 February 1935; Mrs. John Trotwood Moore, Department of Education to George D. Barnes, Jr., letter, 29 October 1937; T .M. N. Lewis to George D. Barnes, letter, 5 November 1942). The Barnes Collection was purchased from his estate through his executor, Mr. J. B. Goodrich, Director of the Bank of Dayton, in 1949 by the University of Tennessee for $50,000.

The Collection

The Barnes Collection contains artifacts from East Tennessee and other nearby regions, with a concentration on mound and village sites along the Tennessee River and its tributaries. Large mound sites such as Hiwassee Island, Moccasin Bend, Toqua Village, and William's Island in Tennessee, and Pine Island, Alabama were excavated, with a large percentage of the artifacts collected from burial contexts (Dr. Susan Frankenberg, personal communication, 1997). The collection also contains artifacts collected from caves between Chattanooga and Johnsonville, Tennessee that Barnes surveyed during high water conditions "...every cave was entered, and every creek explored where it was possible to take a light motor boat." ([NB], 9 August, 1925). Furthermore, he actively traded, or purchased artifacts from other collectors in the Dayton/Chattanooga area. He developed a network of individuals in Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, and North Carolina who provided information about artifacts on the market in their region, and sites available for excavation. The collection is now part of the permanent collections of the Frank H. McClung Museum at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

At the time, the collection was purchased, it was said to weigh nearly 3 tons and contain "thousands" of artifacts ([KJ], 19 August, 1949). In 1937, the Smithsonian Institution estimated that the collection was worth $50,000 to $60,000 ([KNS], 20 May, 1937). One newspaper reported that the total number of artifacts numbered 6,000 "representing 12,000 years of human occupation in Tennessee," from the Paleo-Indian Period through the Historic Period ([KNS], 29 January, 1933).

Previous Research Using the Barnes Collection

The Barnes Collection has not been extensively used since its acquisition by the Museum, however, samples derived from the collection have been studied. The collection has been used to assess hypotheses addressing trade networks in the Southeast during the Late Archaic Period, and to broaden interpretations of activities at the Toqua Mound and Village site. The Toqua site was mined in the 1930's by Mr. Barnes, and was again excavated in the mid-1970's by the University of Tennessee. In 1974, photographs of artifacts in the collection were included in a study that examined certain types of artifact classes found in burials (Hatch 1974). Another mortuary study using the Thruston Collection from Middle Tennessee hypothesized that the presence of certain artifacts types found in burials reflected symbolic aspects related to status in a highly stratified social organization (Smith 1992), and many artifacts found in the Thruston Collection are similar to those in the Barnes Collection.

Early Work at the University of Tennessee

T.M.N. Lewis was particularly interested in the quantity and quality of Proto-Historic and Historic materials and trade items in the Barnes Collection. It was believed that they could provide comparisons with artifacts recovered from archaeological excavations performed under the auspices of the Works Projects Administration (WPA) in the late 1930's (Lyons 1996). T.M.N. Lewis and Madeline Kneberg proposed a hypothesis of unity between prehistoric social bands and archaeologically defined temporal periods by tracing specific material culture back through time, though their overall theoretical preoccupation was searching for a connection between prehistoric populations and the historic Cherokee (Lewis and Kneberg 1947). The data was used to postulate that historic Cherokees were descendants of the prehistoric peoples who occupied the region ([KJ], 19 August, 1949).

Technological Innovation in the Archaic Period

Certain artifact classes in the Barnes Collection have been used to address hypotheses about trade networks in the Southeast during the Late Archaic Period. Dr. Kenneth Sassaman, of the South Carolina Institute of Archaeological Research, used groundstone grooved axes from the Barnes Collection in a comparative study of the functional and morphological attributes of grooved axes to assess regional patterning and technological change during the Late Archaic Period (Sassaman 1996).

Sassaman postulated that production and use of grooved axes aided in defining social roles related to the division of labor and increasing sedentism in the Late Archaic Period. He drew his samples from sites in the Southeast. Seven axes were from the Butterfield Site in East Kentucky, seven axes from the Penitentiary Site in the Middle Tennessee, and 195 axes from the Barnes Collection representing a number of sites and counties in East Tennessee. Sassaman hypothesized that the East Kentucky and the Middle Tennessee groups were more sedentary, and, assuming that all Southeastern groups had stone axe technology, the more elaborately manufactured axes associated with increasing sedentism would be found in the East Kentucky and Middle Tennessee sites.

By examining the distribution of grooved axe forms across the region, he hypothesized that the more elaborate the grooved axe, the more sedentary the group that produced it. This increased sedentism resulted in a more socially complex group that had the time and energy to spend producing elaborate grooved axes. The distribution of a variety of forms found only in certain places in East Tennessee suggest that subsistence intensification linked to tool specialization and residential stability was not the case. Instead, Sassaman found that the more elaborately made axes occurred in seasonally mobile populations; in the context of a hunter-gatherer society that seemingly lacked complexity. This research revealed that the abundance and elaboration of grooved axes was more apparent in mobile and less-complex groups in East Tennessee, and the effects of interaction between groups might account for the variation present in the samples. Grooved axes may have been exchanged within the source area, which in turn, reproduced social relationships within these source areas, rather than filling a social or religious role that other artifacts, such as banner stones, would have filled (Sassaman 1996). Regional exchange networks of such items augmented distribution of labor, a necessary precursor to economic success on the household level, promoted cooperation among groups in the source areas, reduced land use redundancy and the potential for conflict that is present in more sedentary societies (Sassaman 1996:67).

Grooved axes from almost every county in East Tennessee, concentrated in the counties bordering the upper Tennessee River, are represented in the Barnes Collection. It must be noted that collector bias likely played a large part in the number and presence of such well-made artifacts in the Barnes Collection. This bias could account for the presence of unusual axe variants, such as forms with longitudinal slots for hafting and a type of restricted butt end axe that Sassaman classifies as a "ball peen" form (Sassaman 1996:67). Parezo has pointed out that all museum collections are subject to formation processes that affect sample representation (Parezo 1987) and this could explain the large number of axes in the collection. Axes were valued by collectors and produced, in the case of the Barnes Collection, a large sample of over 297 specimens for study (Sassaman 1996:65-6). It is likely that Mr. Barnes collected many of these by walking plowed fields and through purchases from local farmers and from other collectors.

The Toqua Site in East Tennessee

The Barnes Collection has also been used to augment excavation results. A large percentage of the artifacts in the collection are from the Toqua Mound and Village Site, a Dallas Phase Mississippian site of which Mr. Barnes mined a portion in the 1930's. Toqua was excavated in 1975 and 1976 by Dr. Richard P. Polhemus of the University of Tennessee as part of the salvage work for the Tellico Archaeological Project conducted prior to the damming of the Little Tennessee River (Polhemus 1987). Toqua has been of interest to archaeologists and collectors since the 1890's (Thomas 1894:379-388), and Mr. Barnes collected Toqua by systematically mining the northwest quarter of the site, removing approximately 100-150 burials and their associated artifacts.

Bone and antler artifacts, groundstone implements, and pottery vessels from the Barnes Collection were compared with a large assemblage recovered from the 1975 and 1976 excavations. The comparison was performed in order to facilitate descriptions of the site, determine the temporal span of the historic aboriginal occupation, and gain understanding of the context of the portion of the site Barnes commercially mined. This comparison aided interpretations of spatial placement of features of the site, status, and other activities at Toqua (Polhemus 1987).

Mortuary Studies in Tennessee

Since the 1960's, mortuary studies and analysis of grave goods have played a role in the study of rank and status in Mississippian Period societies. Dr. James Hatch postulated that the systematic analysis of mortuary patterning and the artifacts found with burials could reveal social complexity. The presence of a variety of certain artifact classes reflected symbolic aspects related to tribute and ceremonialism, such as the Southern Cult, suggesting access to trade networks that were generally associated with a highly stratified social organization (Smith 1992:275-276).

Hatch analyzed a total of 1,284 burials and their grave goods from 19 well-provenienced sites in East Tennessee, quantifying certain skeletal and artifactual attributes to develop a model that reconstructed sociological behavior in order to explain mortuary patterning (Hatch 1974). This model could then be used to delineate status-specific patterning in the Mississippian Dallas Phase in Tennessee. Though this research did not utilize the Barnes Collection exclusively, Hatch did use artifacts from the Barnes Collection. He presented photographs of artifacts included in his sample along with photographs of similar artifacts from the Barnes Collection to show that such artifacts occurred in other sites within the region.

CHAPTER 4: Inventory Methods and Database Construction

This chapter compares the information available from the Barnes catalog and the Museum catalog, then discusses how this information was used to augment the physical inventory. How the information from both catalogs and the physical inventory was used to construct the database is discussed. The discussion includes the various categories of information in the database, and differences between the catalogs in terms of labeling, tool type definitions. Other information that might impact future research and database management is explored. Finally, the usefulness of the Barnes Collection and this database as research and curation tools is assessed.

Catalog Systems

The Barnes Catalog

Newspaper accounts and correspondence suggest that Mr. Barnes attempted to keep written documentation and photographs of his work. He kept a pocket diary describing his work at Williams Island, but lost it just prior to completing the excavations ([CT], 22 May, 1932; [NB], 9 August, 1925; George D. Barnes to Carl E. Guthe, letter, 9 February 1933, MS-19). The only documentation available is a hand-written catalog furnished by Mr. Barnes, and a photo album containing photographs of burials, many showing artifacts in the collection found with them. The hand-written catalog contains entries for each artifact (Figure 2). The entries reflect the catalog number assigned to that artifact by Mr. Barnes, and sometimes included the site from which the artifact was collected, or other locality such as state and county. More rarely, a brief memo describing the material the artifact was made from, an assignation of a tool type, or measurements of the artifact were included in the entry; for example, "stone gorget" or "groundstone celt—5" by 3."

The Museum Accession Catalog

After the collection was acquired by the University of Tennessee, it was accessioned utilizing a card cataloging system. The accession card system consists of two identical sets of cards: one set organized by accession number, the other set by artifact classification. Each card measures 3" by 5" and contains the following information: the accession number, which is a binomial number consisting of the artifact number followed by the accession group number, for example "365/41". The next category is for artifact type, a brief description of the tool type, such as "celt" or "hammerstone". The card also contains two areas for provenience data: "state" and "locality." The rest of the information on the card pertains to who collected the artifact, or from whom the artifact was received. A final category for acquisition by the University is located at the bottom of the card. The back of the card was used to record the actual location of the artifact during the physical inventory (Figure 3).

Categorical Information

Artifact Numbering and Labeling Under Both Systems

Mr. Barnes assigned artifact numbers in rank order from 1 through 3499, regardless of the artifact class, provenience, or other scheme. This numbering scheme was carried over to the Museum accessioning system as well: the numbers in the hand-written catalog match the catalog numbers found on the museum accession cards. The numbers also include a subset defined by the letter "A" or "a", with a lower-case "b" in rarer cases. A capital letter was used to distinguish between two identical catalog numbers, such as "A106" versus "106". The small case "a" was used as both a prefix and a suffix for the same reason, for example "106a" or "a106". In a few instances, a number contained both cases, such as "A106a". The reason for this is unknown.

The majority of the artifacts were labeled with India ink, though some were labeled with gummed paper labels affixed directly to the artifact. It is unknown if the India ink labeling was done by Mr. Barnes, or by the Museum staff during accessioning. In some cases, the paper labels had detached from the artifacts, and there was no way to identify to which artifact the label belonged. This created a number of problems. First, because the numbering scheme in the Museum catalog is identical to the numbering scheme in the Barnes catalog, the same numbers and descriptions were used. This made it difficult to trace the assigned number to a single artifact within a box of similar, unlabeled artifacts, such as antler tines. In a few cases, the artifact had both a paper label and an India ink label, and in other rare cases, these numbers did not match. If a card could be found that identified the correct number, a process of elimination could sometimes be employed. Confusion was further compounded when 1) there was a number, but no accompanying card, and 2) there were two cards and no number on the artifact.

Inventory Methods

A physical inventory of the collection was performed in order to determine which artifacts were present in the museum, on display, exchanged, on loan, or missing. There are 3499 numbered entries in the Barnes catalog, however, there are 3663 artifacts with catalog numbers accounted for in the inventory (Table 2). Table 2 lists the artifacts in the Barnes Collection by tool type and material type. It is assumed that the tool and material types were defined by Mr. Barnes in his catalog, and taken wholly by Museum personnel during accession as these match in both systems.

The artifact counts represent all the artifacts recorded on the accession cards. In many cases, it does not reflect what is physically present. For example, a number of shell beads may be present for a single card listing a "shell bead", or a card may list a "necklace" without describing how many beads make up the necklace. A more comprehensive discussion of the artifact count will be provided later in the chapter.

Table 2 lists 12 material types and 84 tool types based on the card catalog, though two of the material type classifications are misleading. These are "burial" and "scalp." Both "burial" and "scalp" consist of human osteological material or soft tissue, thus are not in and of themselves artifacts. The burials are listed here because they received a catalog number in both the Barnes and the museum catalog systems, and each is counted as a single artifact. It is likely that this was an attempt by Mr. Barnes to keep a burial and its accompanying artifacts together as a unit. The artifacts that accompanied the burials were not counted separately for several reasons; first, many of the artifacts found with a burial were unlabeled and had no separate card or number assigned. Burials are stored in a different location within the museum, and could not be located after an extensive search, therefore, only the card reveals that it had been accessioned, not that it was present. It is unknown if all the burials had accompanying artifacts. There is documentation for burial associated artifacts for five burials in the NAGPRA (Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act) files in the Museum, however, they are not assigned separate catalog numbers. Additionally, there are artifact numbers assigned to seven burials, with burial association data on only on five.

The inventory was conducted by matching the Museum accession cards with artifacts stored in the Archaeology Laboratory, Collections Storage, the Security Vault, as well as against documents for those artifacts on loan, missing, exchanged, or on exhibit. The two accession cards were matched up and the artifact compared with the cards, if present in the museum, to confirm that the information matched the number labeled on the artifact and the artifact matched the number and the description on the two accession cards. The location was noted on the back of the card in the upper left-hand corner. Locations of artifacts not present in the museum, such as those on loan, missing, or exchanged, were also noted on the back of the card. The storage conditions of the artifacts in the collection varied. Artifacts located in the Archaeology Lab lay on padded trays (unbagged in most cases) and assigned to particular shelves in locked cabinets.

The artifacts in the Collections Storage Area were either wrapped in newspaper in storage boxes, or were loose in the boxes. Artifacts stored in the Collections Storage Area and the Archaeology Lab were repackaged in acid-free plastic bags, with the Museum accession number written on the bag with indelible marker. The artifacts stored in the Collections Storage Area were returned to the original storage boxes after each box was lined with etha-foam, and bagged separately in acid-free plastic bags with the accession number written on the bag. The boxes were then returned to the designated shelves in the Collections Storage Area. Artifacts in the Archaeology Lab were returned to their designated trays in the cabinets.

The Database

Using Microsoft Office in Windows 98©, a spreadsheet was developed in Microsoft Excel containing 14 fields. Seven were drawn directly from the information provided by the accession cards (Fields 1, 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, and 10), and 7 developed as the result of the physical inventory (Fields 3, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14) (Table 3). The spreadsheet was then converted into Microsoft Office Access database program for manipulation (Appendix 1).

Field 1—The Barnes Catalog Number

The Barnes catalog number was entered to track the artifact through his catalog, and to serve as a primary key for manipulation of the database in Access. As the hand-written catalog is the only original documentation that accompanied the collection, it is important to maintain this primary source so that entries can be cross-referenced with other information in the record should records be lost or mistakenly deleted. Should the museum develop a new numbering scheme for the collection that differs from the original numbering scheme, the original Barnes number should be retained.

Field 2—The Museum Catalog/Accession Number

The museum accession catalog number is the number found on the pair of identical cards in the museum catalog. This number is the Barnes catalog number with the addition of the museum accession number ("41").

Field 3—Artifact Location

Field 3 records the location of the artifact with that catalog number. The predominant entry is a location in the Collections Storage area in the museum. The location is designated by an alphanumeric string representing aisle. row. column. shelf. For example, "C.6.B.4" represents a box on shelf 4 in column B of row 6, on aisle C. Other information in this field includes "on loan". These are artifacts in the collection that have been loaned to other museums, institutions companies, schools, or are otherwise not physically present, but accounted for through documents on file at McClung Museum. "Ontario" refers to those artifacts in the collection, which were part of an exchange in 1956 with the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto, Ontario, Canada, for portions of a collection in their holdings. "TC" stands for a storage cabinet in the Archaeology Laboratory at McClung Museum, and means "type collection." This cabinet holds comparative examples of certain artifact types that are available for research. "Vault" stands for the security vault at McClung Museum. "Missing" stands for those artifacts for which a catalog card exists, or which have a museum accession number, but could not be located during the physical inventory or from other documentation sources, such as loans (Table 4). The accession card and the actual physical properties of the artifact, and the material type were decided upon after discussions with the Archaeological Curator.

Two categories for material and tool type, which were removed from the database, are "burial" and "scalp". A burial is neither an artifact type nor a material type, however, Mr. Barnes did give seven burials in the collection their own catalog number as artifacts. This may have been an attempt by Mr. Barnes to keep the osteological material and the artifacts that accompanied it together as a single unit for display purposes. Finally, "40HA43" stands for the state site number designation found on official site forms located in the files of the McClung Museum. The state site number is an alphanumeric trinomial designation. The first two numbers represent the state the site is located in, such as the state of Tennessee. The alpha portion of the string designates the county within the state. The two numbers completing the string represent the number of sites recorded for that designated county. In this case, 40HA43 refers to the Williams Island site, which is the forty-third site recorded in Hamilton County within the state of Tennessee. Sites in the database with this designation denote that recordation of that site or further investigation site has occurred, resulting in a site form, and has been added to the state inventory of sites.

Field 4—Artifact Material Type

This field lists the material type for the artifact, and is drawn directly from the museum accession cards. There are nine material types used in the database (Table 2). Artifacts that included a number of different materials were classified by the most predominant material type, and counted as a single object, based upon the classification on the card. For example, an unstrung necklace consisting of glass trade beads, animal bone, and a shell ornament was counted as a single trade bead necklace. Shapes of artifacts, for example spatulated or rectangular chipped stone hoes, were classified only by artifact type (e. g., hoe).

Where there were discrepancies between the information listed on the card and the artifacts, the information on the card was used. There is museum documentation for artifacts associated with five of the seven burials with accession numbers, however, most of these artifacts are not labeled or have separate artifact numbers. Because of this ambiguity, and because the human burials and their associated grave goods fall under NAGPRA regulations, these were not included in the database. The following table includes those burials accessioned by the museum, their location, the extent of osteological material for each, and any other information available from the museum catalog (Table 5).

Field 5—Tool Type I

This field lists the tool type as delineated in the Barnes catalog, but it is taken directly from the museum accession card. The information in this field is identical in the two catalogs. It appears that the museum used typological categories set up by Mr. Barnes. Where there was conflict between the two systems, the information listed on the museum accession cards was used. Again, it is assumed that the information on the museum card reflected a classification system used by Mr. Barnes and adopted by the museum during the accessioning process, however, it is unknown if this was applied to the entire collection during accessioning or for only those artifacts previously not classified by Mr. Barnes.

Field 6—Tool Type II

Field 6 is a sub-type category, allowing for finer distinctions with respect to either artifact material type or tool type. This field contains a variety of data designed to add further descriptive information about the artifact in order to set it apart from other similar artifacts. For example, a bracelet made of brass would have "metal" in the material type field, with "brass" listed in Field 6. This was an aid where cards could not be matched with an artifact, or where two cards with the same catalog number recorded for two different artifact types occurred.

Field 7—Artifact Count

This field is the only numeric field in the database. Both catalog systems reflected a single number applied to a single artifact, however, there are exceptions. For example, an unstrung bead necklace consisting of glass trade beads, animal bone, and a shell ornament was counted as a single trade bead necklace. Unstrung necklaces were counted as a single artifact, as were fragmented and broken artifacts. Numerous bone tools that were not labeled could not be accounted for in the card inventory. This affected the total artifact count for the collection, as only the number of artifacts recorded on the accession card, or labeled with catalog numbers, was entered. This was to prevent entering artifacts that may not have been accessioned, or could not be positively traced to the Barnes Collection. Labeled artifacts that did not have an accompanying catalog card were included in the count. When more than one artifact had the same number, but did not have a card to confirm that they were grouped together, these were counted as single artifacts with multiple numbers. Artifacts from the burials in Table 3 were also excluded.

Without knowing if artifacts classified as "missing" will be traced later, the information in this field will continue to be inaccurate until either these artifacts are traced or it is confirmed they are not in the collection. It is important to note that these inaccuracies cannot be corrected until a determination is made regarding how to count those items made from a variety of materials, how to count unlabeled artifacts, and how to confirm the disposition of the missing artifacts.

Field 8—State Provenience

Field 8 lists provenience information at the state level. This information was taken directly from the museum accession cards. The majority of the artifacts come from sites in East Tennessee, but the collection also contains artifacts from Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia, with a single artifact from Arkansas. There are 1430 records with no state provenience information listed. However, where state provenience is available it is always accompanied by either a county or a site provenience, with the exception of 21 entries for Tennessee, one for Georgia, one for Alabama, and one for Arkansas.

Field 9—County Provenience

Field 9 lists provenience information at the county level. This information was taken directly from the museum accession cards. Most records that contain a state provenience contain at least a county or a site provenience as well. Artifacts with state and site provenience, but no county provenience, are from states other than Tennessee.

Field 10—Site Provenience

Field 10 lists site provenience. This information was taken directly from the museum accession cards. Most records that contain site level provenience can be traced to a registered site in the McClung Museum state site files, with the exception of sites found in other states. Other records list only very general locations, such as "near Knoxville" or "Caves in the Cumberland Mountains."

Where the site name has been matched with a Tennessee state site number, that number has been used instead of the site name. This applies only to the database; the name of the site is still listed on the museum accession cards and in the Barnes catalog.

Field 11—Temporal/Cultural Affiliation for Sites

This field contains information regarding the temporal/cultural affiliation of the site. Temporal affiliation was derived from "The Archaeological Collection at the Frank H. McClung Museum" (Chapman 1988). This Occasional Paper lists collections from sites that had also been collected by Mr. Barnes, and thus could be used to apply a temporal affiliation to the sites represented in the collection.

Field 12—Temporal/Cultural Affiliation for Artifacts

This field contains information regarding the temporal/cultural affiliation for the artifact in that record. This information was derived from "Tellico Archaeology: 12,000 Years of Native American History" (Chapman 1985), as well as "The Toqua Site: A Late Mississippi Dallas Phase Town" (Polhemus 1987).

Field 13—Objects on Loan

Field 13 records where an artifact is on loan, either within the museum or at an outside location. This field is cross-referenced to Field 3, the Location field. Field 13 lists the names of the museums, companies, and other institutions to which Barnes Collection material has been loaned, including both private sector companies, such as Kimberly-Clarke in Tennessee, and other museums, such as the Cherokee Museum in Oklahoma.

Field 14—Problems

This field lists specific problems encountered for that artifact during the physical inventory process. These problems can be traced primarily to inequities between the two catalog systems, and/or between the catalog data and the physical observation of the artifact. There are over 750 records with problems listed. Problems include: 1) unnumbered artifacts that could not be matched with an accession card, 2) two of the same type of artifact with the same number, each residing in different locations within the museum, 3) artifacts that had neither a card nor number, but were found with like artifacts in a Barnes Collection box, 4) one catalog number applied to multiple artifacts and multiple cards, 5) numbered artifacts with no matching card, 6) poorly labeled artifacts, 7) artifacts which did not match the card number, 8) two artifacts and two cards with the same number residing in the same location, 9) other information relevant to an artifact that was accessioned but can no longer be accounted for, such as thefts, altered cards, curation problems, and locations not included in Field 3.

The construction of this database is just a beginning. It has been constructed to provide an easy means to access the collection, manipulate the data, and to provide a means to update information about the collection as it is used in the future. Fields will undoubtedly be added, and a more complete picture of the collection constructed through research, additions, and changes.

CHAPTER 5: Evaluation of the Research Potential of the Barnes Collection

This chapter assesses the quality of information gathered from the assessment of the two catalog systems and from the physical inventory. The information in relevant database fields will be assessed for veracity and quality, and an evaluation of the potential for research using the collection will be made. A discussion of future research and curatorial needs is included.

Quality of Catalog Information

The primary problem with access to the collection lies in the initial cataloging by the museum. Correlation of Barnes' hand-written catalog with the museum catalog reveals that the museum used Barnes' numbering system. This resulted in a continuation of recordation errors from the Barnes' catalog to the museum catalog. There are also gaps in the numbering sequence which cannot be explained. These may be the result of omissions, the sale of artifacts, or errors in the transfer of the information from the Barnes catalog to the museum catalog. For example, there are significant gaps reflecting approximately 600 artifacts that were not accessioned by the museum, though they are listed in the Barnes catalog.

A number of artifacts are labeled with only the museum collection identity number "41." The reason for this is unknown. These artifacts may have a catalog number, but they cannot be traced through either cataloging system. It is also not known why other artifacts were included but unlabeled. The problems listed in Field 14 affect the veracity of the total count for the collection, which in turn affects the total for artifacts counted as part of a class of tool types. Fortunately, these problems can be remedied through constant updating of the database by the curator and researchers who will study the collection. For example, by taking an inventory of a certain class during a study inaccuracies in the count, classification, and numbering system, can be traced a class at a time, rather than dealing with the whole collection at once.

Quality of Tool Type Classification

The tool typology used in the catalogs is synchronic, likely reflecting a typology used during that period by collectors in Tennessee and through the Southeast. Typologies for the Southeast are still in development, and thus the usefulness of these tool classes is limited to providing a general description. Tool classifications, particularly in the shell, groundstone, and chipped stone tool categories, follow a typology for Mississippian Period artifacts that is evident in other similar collections collected generally around this time period, such as the Thruston Collection. This may reflect the use of a common typology developed by collectors during this period. During the period when Mr. Barnes was building this collection, A.V. Kidder developed a classification scheme for bone tools, however, it cannot be shown that Mr. Barnes used this system. Finally, Mr. Barnes could have developed his own classificatory system. Any of these alternatives is possible, but none can be confirmed based on the information available in either catalog system.

Quality of Provenience Information

The provenience information that represents a match between the catalog information and temporal period with a site record is the most trustworthy. Provenience data for the rest of the catalog is suspect. For example, one entry that appeared in both catalogs was for Tellico Plains in Scott County, Virginia. There is no Tellico Plains in Scott County, VA, so it is likely that Mr. Barnes meant Tellico Plains, Tennessee. There are sites listed in the site field that cannot be traced through the state site files at McClung Museum. Though these sites include a state and county provenience, it is likely that 1) the site has been investigated and registered under another name, or 2) it is a name applied by Mr. Barnes or other local collectors who worked the site, or 3) it is the name given to Mr. Barnes by those from whom he purchased artifacts. As these sites are untraceable to one that has been archaeologically investigated the artifacts from these sites fall into the category of unprovenienced. Unfortunately, little can be done to improve the provenience information for these sites.

Evaluation

Sullivan's criteria for the research potential of archaeological collections are "1) the project design or plan; (2) the quality of recording and recovery; and (3) the redundancy of information" (Sullivan 1997:9). The George D. Barnes Jr. Collection holds a potential for research, with certain caveats pertaining to these criteria.

Regarding the first criterion, the plan or project design must be one that is not dependent entirely on stratigraphic or intra-site contexts, as the provenience information is too incomplete to be useful for this type of analysis. For this reason, other research designs should probably look at the broader spectrum of prehistoric human behaviors that account for the presence of the artifacts. In other words, does the collection represent the archaeological record? By viewing the collection from a broader ideological framework as a tangible endpoint of behaviors that may be associated with them, researchers could address the behaviors that caused them to be present in the archaeological record, such as ceremonial or symbolic behaviors (Sassaman 1996; Smith 1992; Stott and Reynolds 1986).

Regarding the second criterion, the Barnes Collection could be used comparatively with other collections derived from better contexts, as it has been suggested that certain artifact types can proffer interpretations about behavioral processes (Hatch 1974). The majority of the collection comes from East Tennessee from counties near Mr. Barnes' home, such as Hamilton, Monroe, Rhea, and Roane counties. These are the best-represented counties in the collection, with many artifacts from several well-documented sites. These artifacts could be assembled to examine a site's place in a broad-based regional study addressing questions about prehistoric societies in East Tennessee. It has been demonstrated that interpretations of prehistoric social behavioral patterns can be drawn from the analysis of collections of certain types of artifacts, particularly at the regional level, with morphology and distribution of certain artifact classes representing a particular temporal period in East Tennessee (Sassaman 1996).

Regarding the third criterion, this collection lacks the precise provenience data necessary to perform fine-grain analysis and research. However, the collection has been used extensively for education and exhibits, as well as a source for lending to other institutions. Long term lending has not reduced or depleted the collection to the point that it cannot be used for other research purposes. This is possible due to the number, variety, condition, and physical quality of the artifacts.

The collection continues to have great value as a source of loans, for hands-on teaching and study, and for exhibition. By continuing to use this collection for these purposes, other provenienced collections suffer less wear and tear, reducing the possibility of loss, theft, or breakage that could affect the integrity of these collections.

One aspect of the research potential that has not been determined definitively is what the collection represents in terms of artifact classes, total numbers of artifacts within classes, or artifact typology. The entire collection has never been analyzed, and only portions of certain artifact classes used for research (Sassaman 1996). Tool classifications could be addressed as researchers study certain classes of artifacts in the collection. The Barnes and museum classifications can be retained in the database and card catalog while the new classifications are added, and tracked via the database. The material classes which are well represented, but about which the least is known, are the bone and antler classes. According to Coughlin (1996) most bone tool studies are simple classification studies, functional studies, or manufacturing studies

(Kidder and Barondess 1981), using morphology, presumed function, or ethnographic analogy (Lewis and Kneberg 1947). A thorough analysis of the tools could shed light on certain sites that have been formally investigated since Mr. Barnes day, such as Toqua, or Williams Island, a part of the Moccasin Bend Site. Until analysis is conducted, this aspect of the research potential can only be addressed by stating that the collection contains assemblages whose analysis will add to the overall research potential of the entire collection once analysis is completed.

The Barnes Collection fails to meet a high quality archaeological standard of recording or recovery. First, the collecting techniques of that time period did not reflect rigorous archaeological methods, resulting in lost contextual data that can never be recovered. For example, a researcher seeking the location of every celt in the collection will be able to quickly access that information via the database, however, the level of description included in the database is limited, such that the researcher would have to examine each celt for a particular morphological or stylistic aspect pertinent to the research design.

Second, without documentation there is no way to know how collector bias has shaped the content of the collection. The development of the database is an attempt to provide some flexibility with the documentation and data that is present. It is hoped a researcher who utilizes the collection can build a study sample with more ease and efficiency, or decide what part of the collection to use to augment other research. Additionally, the database provides a means to quickly add information to, or broaden information about, the collection after analyses has been conducted. Finally, it is a more efficient curation tool than the card catalog system, in that changes and locations of artifacts can be tracked more efficiently.

Furthermore, in terms of redundancy, the Barnes Collection must be viewed in three ways: on a collection by collection basis within McClung Museum, on an institution to institution basis, and on a regional basis. Collections of this type can no longer be constructed legally utilizing the sorts of collection regimes used by Mr. Barnes. His concentration on burial contexts has resulted in a collection that holds examples of intricate and beautiful handiwork that has all but disappeared from the archaeological record due to vandalism, a decreasing number of sites available for archaeological research, and as a result of legislation protecting Native American burials and sacred objects. For an institution the size of McClung Museum, the Barnes Collection represents a large collection that can attract numerous scholars, educators, and institutions interested in examining and displaying the prehistory of East Tennessee.

Future Research Using the Barnes Collection

The Barnes Collection has been used for distributional and regional studies related to artifact types, raw material acquisition and use, and morphological characteristics specific to certain artifact classes (Sassaman1993, 1996). Trade patterns in non-local exotic materials such as native copper and marine shell, and examination of stylistic differences in shell gorgets and pipes could be examined. Studies in morphological and stylistic variability or techno-functional differences could be compared with regional types developed from well-documented collections housed at other institutions in Tennessee and the Southeast. A behavioral/technological study of the lithics in the collection could be conducted wherein cherts with known distribution could provide information on quarry areas in Tennessee (Smith 1992). Other artifact classes could be used to investigate special elements of Southeastern prehistoric cultures, particularly in the Proto-Historic Period. The inventory process revealed the collection contains a large assemblage of bone and antler tools that have never been analyzed. Analysis of this artifact class could be used to develop typological classifications based on function that would be useful in examining bone tool use and morphology in East Tennessee.

Managing and Curating the Collection

Efforts to manage and continue to display the Barnes Collection will only enhance its potential as a research and teaching resource. It is suggested that grant funding be applied for in order to finish repackaging the artifacts, and for the purchase of storage cabinets whereby the collection can be organized as part of coordination between access, storage, and database management. The database should be regularly updated to incorporate changes resulting from research using the collection. By tracking where artifacts are on loan, what factors have resulted in missing artifacts, and maintaining a field in the database for information addressing the problems listed in Field 14, management will be streamlined, and maintenance of the collection and database enhanced.

VITA

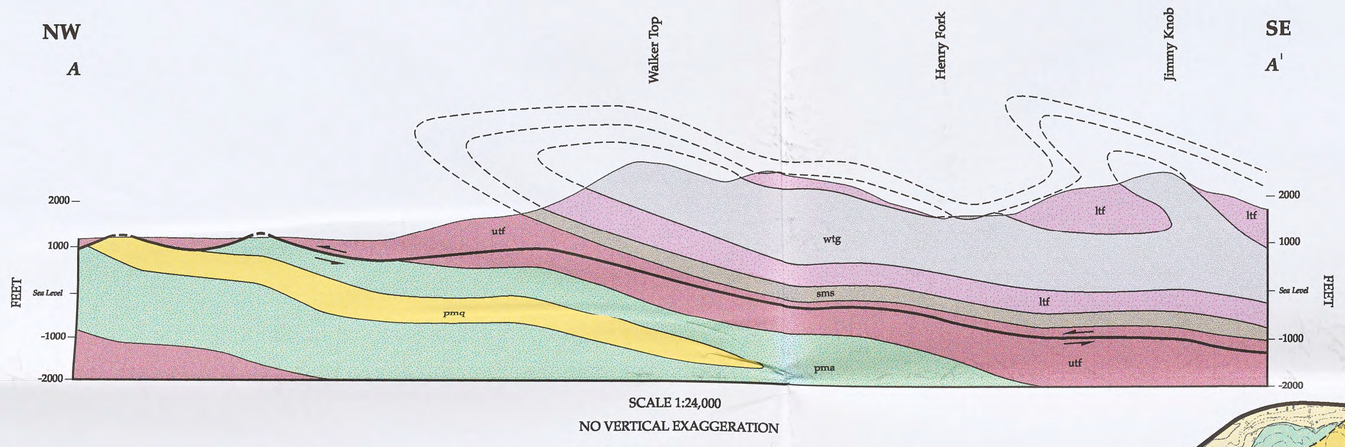

Wendy L. Tolleson-Goodman was born on May 10, 1954 in Bethesda Naval Hospital. Her family moved to Hawaii in 1963, where her father was the Prime Recovery Officer for the NASA Gemini program. She quit high school in 1971 to pursue a musical career, retiring from music in 1976. She then worked as a corporate placement specialist until 1978, when she earned her GED. In 1982 she graduated summa cum laude , from Allegheny Community College in Pittsburgh, PA earning an Associates Degree in Science with a major in Business She attended Duquesne University's School of Business on a full scholarship, graduating magna cum laude with a Bachelors Degree in Business Administration in 1984. After working around the United States and the Pacific in the field of archaeology as a field crew hand, crew chief, project director, and manager of a branch office of a contract firm on the island of Guam, she returned to school at the University of Tennessee in Knoxville, TN. in 1995. She earned a Masters Degree in Anthropology, with a specialty in archaeology in the summer of 1999.

Wendy is currently employed by the Hawaii Army National Guard in the Environmental Office at Headquarters, Honolulu, as the Cultural Resources Manager. She is responsible for the management of all cultural resources, including archaeological sites, historic properties, and sacred sites, located on 34 properties situated on the seven major islands of the Hawaiian chain for the Guard.
