During my editorial work on Pursuit, I have been most impressed by the work of my peers, both those who have submitted work to the journal and those on the review board. As the managing editor and now editor-in-chief, I have had the opportunity to read the scholarly work of my fellow students. I am lucky to have been able to read these articles because otherwise I would not know the large quantity of quality research being completed on this campus. I certainly would never have normally read articles in some disciplines, but such is the beauty of a journal open to all students in all disciplines in all colleges. Multidisciplinary journals combine a plethora of diverse topics in one place and truly display the quality of research completed by undergraduate students in many different disciplinary areas.

Without the extensive knowledge and commitment of the editors and reviewers, such a scholastically-diverse journal as Pursuit would not be possible. Managing editors, articles editors, research editors, and review board members all play an integral part in the long, complicated process of publishing a scholarly journal. Speaking for the entire review board, I believe participating in Pursuit has been a learning experience for all of us, one which has allowed us to use some of the skills we have developed during our undergraduate careers and one which has also taught us new skills we will use in our future careers and scholastic pursuits. Again, I cannot say enough how impressed I am by the knowledge and hard work of my fellow editors and review board members, as well as by the scholastic accomplishment of those whose articles are published in this volume.
