

University of Tennessee, Knoxville

TRACE: Tennessee Research and Creative Exchange

Doctoral Dissertations

Graduate School

6-1959

Milton's Secret Adversary: Du Moulin and the Politics of Protestant Humanism

Harry G. Merrill III

University of Tennessee, Knoxville

Follow this and additional works at: https://trace.tennessee.edu/utk_graddiss

 Part of the English Language and Literature Commons

Recommended Citation

Merrill, Harry G. III, "Milton's Secret Adversary: Du Moulin and the Politics of Protestant Humanism. " PhD diss., University of Tennessee, 1959.
https://trace.tennessee.edu/utk_graddiss/4297

This Dissertation is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at TRACE: Tennessee Research and Creative Exchange. It has been accepted for inclusion in Doctoral Dissertations by an authorized administrator of TRACE: Tennessee Research and Creative Exchange. For more information, please contact trace@utk.edu.

To the Graduate Council:

I am submitting herewith a dissertation written by Harry G. Merrill III entitled "Milton's Secret Adversary: Du Moulin and the Politics of Protestant Humanism." I have examined the final electronic copy of this dissertation for form and content and recommend that it be accepted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, with a major in English.

John L. Lievsay, Major Professor

We have read this dissertation and recommend its acceptance:

Alwin Thaler, Arthur Hurst Moser, Kenneth Curry, Walter E. Stiefel

Accepted for the Council:

Carolyn R. Hodges

Vice Provost and Dean of the Graduate School

(Original signatures are on file with official student records.)

May 27, 1959

To the Graduate Council:

I am submitting herewith a thesis written by H. G. Merrill, III entitled "Milton's Secret Adversary: Du Moulin and the Politics of Protestant Humanism." I recommend that it be accepted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, with a major in English.

John L. Liewsay
Major Professor

We have read this thesis and recommend its acceptance:

Alvin Thaler

Arthur H. Moxer

Kenneth Curry

Walter E. Stiefel

Accepted for the Council:

Alfred Mantel
Dean of the Graduate School

MILTON'S SECRET ADVERSARY:

DU MOULIN AND THE POLITICS OF PROTESTANT HUMANISM

A DISSERTATION

Submitted to The Graduate Council of
The University of Tennessee in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

by

H. G. Merrill, III

June 1959

22
33

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

It is hoped that this study will provide in accessible form not only the first English translation of Peter Du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum (1652), but also the information necessary to recreate, in its vitality and strength, the community of Protestant humanism in the seventeenth century which the English Rebellion affected, and out of which Du Moulin's famous book grew.

Whatever merits this study may have are due in very great part to others. Research in rare books and documents was largely enabled by a grant from the Southern Fellowships Fund. Courtesies were extended by the staffs of the University of Chicago Library, the University of Illinois Library, and, through Dr. Henry Dubester, of the Library of Congress.

Especially remarkable were the kindnesses shown by The Newberry Library, Chicago, and members of its "family"--Dr. Stanley Pargellis, librarian, and Mrs. Gertrude Woodward, Mr. James Wells, Dr. Hans Baron, Dr. Ruth Butler, Mrs. Mabel Erler, Mr. Malcolm Harbridge, Mr. Ben Bowman, Mr. Fred Hall, and Mrs. Amy Nyholm.

Helpful assistance and criticism came from the staff of The Folger Shakespeare Library in Washington, particularly from Dr. Louis B. Wright, its director, and Dr. James McManaway and Dr. Dorothy Mason.

This study is especially indebted to the criticism of Professors John L. Lievsay, Alwin Thaler, Arthur Hurst Moser, Walter E. Stiefel, and Kenneth Curry of the University of Tennessee. Their attentive suggestions enabled many improvements in presenting the material herein. Thanks are also due to Miss Louise Slagle for checking the typescript of this study.

Without the warm personal encouragements of Mr. Richard L. Krelstein, Mr. Allan Silverberg, and Mr. John Lasley Dameron, this work might not have been completed.

H. J. Merrill, Jr.

Knorrville, Tennessee

21 May 1959

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

MILTON'S SECRET ADVERSARY

| | |
|--------------------------|-----|
| Acknowledgment | 11 |
| Dedication | vi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Chapter I | 12 |
| Chapter II | 31 |
| Chapter III | 69 |
| Chapter IV | 110 |
| Chapter V | 166 |
| Chapter VI | 197 |

REGII SANGUINIS CLAMOR AD COELUM, BY PETER DU MOULIN

| | |
|---|-----|
| Note on the Translation | 251 |
| Dedication to King Charles II | 254 |
| To the Christian Reader | 262 |
| Chapter I | 266 |
| Chapter II | 282 |
| Chapter III | 325 |
| Chapter IV | 336 |
| Chapter V | 342 |
| Chapter VI | 356 |
| Chapter VII | 366 |

PAGE

| | |
|--|-----|
| Chapter VIII | 371 |
| Ode to Salmasius | 384 |
| Against that Depraved Wretch John Milton | 388 |

NOTES, BIBLIOGRAPHY, AND APPENDICES TO MILTON'SSECRET ADVERSARY

| | |
|--------------------------------|-----|
| Notes to Chapter I | 399 |
| Notes to Chapter II | 408 |
| Notes to Chapter III | 423 |
| Notes to Chapter IV | 436 |
| Notes to Chapter V | 451 |
| Notes to Chapter VI | 460 |
| BIBLIOGRAPHY | 483 |
| APPENDIX A | 503 |
| APPENDIX B | 504 |

IN MEMORIAM
CARISSIMI PATRIS,
QUI ME HOC OPVS PERIFICERE
AVXILIO, BENIGNITATE, MULTOS PER ANNOS AMORE

COHORTATVS EST:

VIR QVIDEM CLARUS
PIETATE ET BENEVOLENTIA
INSIGNIS,
TALEM HIC MVNDVS RVRSVS
NVNQVAM VIDEBIT.

INTRODUCTION

Upon That Memorable Scene

As old books open on the past, their times rise around them, regaining in varied scenes the pulse of life. A Huguenot congregation listens admiringly as its eloquent minister retells how John Calvin saved True Religion from the night of Babylonian ignorance, or denounces the political doctrines of the Jesuits as homicidal. Kept at a distance by Roundhead soldiers, a tense mob watches as a King of England, with ceremonial dignity, bows his head upon a squat wooden block to pray and await the thud of a gleaming ax. Far from his birthplace in France, an Anglican priest combs his Latin lexicon for words strong enough to convict before the world those fanatic rascals who killed his King. A blind Puritan poet, certain of Divine illumination within, also seeks adequate terms to crush the secret adversary who has besmirched him. Wrongly accused by the poet, a gifted preacher who never quite got along with his colleagues protests vainly, again and again, his innocence of charges of writing an offending book, questioning the mysteries of religion, and robbing the virtue of serving-maids. Or, eagerly searching the horizons of a science which promises unlimited prosperity and dominion of the world, members of the fledgling Royal Society try to silence croaks of "Atheism!" and, to prove the existence of God, solemnly debate the occult powers of old crones and the evil eye. All these are parts of the life of the seventeenth century as it emerges from the book here translated, and from the life of its author.

Written by Dr. Peter Du Moulin, the book is entitled Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum Adversus Paricidas Anglicanos (The Hague, 1652). Despite its bloodthirsty title, the volume is much more than a literary oddity; it is a lively document expressive of political theory stoutly maintained by French and English Protestantism during much of the seventeenth century. Because it is a conservative statement of the old order based on the Divine Right of Kings, it attacks the Puritans who fought, and the Regicides who tried and executed Charles I in 1649. Of the many Royalist tracts denouncing that judicial murder, it is the most effective. If one wishes delightful recreative reading, polemics will, of course, never do. But, as Citizen Tom Paine bears witness, propaganda can sometimes become art, and Regii Sanguinis Clamor may at moments aspire to this status. If one can bear an occasional dash of bitterness, its chief qualifications are its clear-cut, coherent organization, and the whiplash of its invective. These were probably the qualities which made the book dangerous and gave it contemporary fame--or notoriety.

It was addressed to an international audience which the execution of Charles had gravely disturbed. The scene of King Charles upon the black-draped scaffold outside Whitehall--as with courtly bearing he gave his locket to Bishop Juxon, bowed his comely head upon the ugly block, called "Remember! Remember!" to the Bishop, and uttered his final prayers--will always have its own grim fascination. But the thrill of horror which the deed sent through Europe grew from far deeper causes. The Reformation of a century before had cleft the religious unity of Europe and then turned upon itself. No real adjustment between Protestant and Catholic nations had been achieved as yet, and so long as religion weighed heavily in the diplomatic balance, no principle of equilibrium was likely to be found. With religious toleration generally unacceptable, the relationship of Church and State was uncertain or uneasy. This situation was worsened by the political intriguing of the Jesuits and the propagation of their teaching that the people had made and could break their Kings, with the Pope holding the power to depose monarchs and free subjects of their allegiance. Particularly in France, where the Huguenots had earlier stressed the right of rebellion, was there uneasiness at the English revolt. Having gained its freedom by rebelling against Philip II (who technically was not its King), the Dutch nation had not yet decided on a monarchy. As a horrifying assertion of a people's right and power to try and execute its sovereign, the execution of Charles seemed to strike at the traditional foundations of government, law, and order. The King's death was no insular affair.

The three nations which principally made up the audience watching the royal tragedy were held together by a cultural bond which we may call Protestant humanism. As understood here, the term may be defined as the veneration and study of ancient authors in philosophy, history, religion, and literature within the elastic boundaries of Protestant doctrine. Because of its reverence for Antiquity, as well as tradition and utility, humanism employed Latin as its medium of communication. It was to such humanism, on account of the foregoing reasons, that influential books about the English revolution were addressed, and it is the culture reflected in Regii Sanguinis Clamor. Acclaim by this public was a great reward.

If the age venerated Ancient learning, it idolized the mastery of it. Consequently, scholars made up a sort of intellectual aristocracy and because of their prestige were often solicited to write works in major controversies, works heavily freighted with the baggage of ancient authors, their credentials. Later in the century, the intellectual and spiritual revolt, of which the King's execution was a part, would turn against this humanism as it was found in the Aristotelian curriculum of the Universities, and seek to promote a new philosophy of experimental science instead. Because of the materialistic implications of the New Science, as well as of other new philosophies, alarmed men would elevate witches to the zenith of their literary popularity in an attempt to prove the existence of evil spirits, and hence God.

But in the meanwhile, the King's execution was gripping the minds of men. Shortly after his death, a book which he is believed to have written excited a great wave of sympathy for the figure of Charles the Martyr. It was entitled Eikon Basilike, The Portraicture of His Sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings. Written in a limpid prose, it was a prayerful justification of the political and religious policies of Charles which had brought his downfall. It was an almost perfect reflection of the royal personality which Charles had displayed at his trial and on the scaffold. Since the immediate effect of the book was domestic, John Milton, the Latin secretary for Cromwell's government, was called upon to answer it with his Eikonoklastes. But partly at the instigation of the new refugee King, Charles II, and partly because of his sympathy with the English Royalists, Claude de Saumaise, a Huguenot then resident in Holland and the most celebrated scholar of his time, wrote a much heralded book, the Defensio Regia Pro Carolo I. Designed for an international audience, the book was quickly read throughout Europe and Scandinavia. Milton also wrote a reply to this, his Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio (1650). Milton's reply also was widely read, and he convinced himself that he had vanquished Saumaise. Mortified at the things Milton had said of him and his work, Salmasius was working on a reply to Milton when he died at the Spa in 1653; but the reply, his Responsio ad Miltonum, was not published by his son until 1660.

So impressively had Salmasius, "the Prince of Letters," loomed on the horizon that he was invited to Sweden by Queen Christina, also the patron of Grotius and Descartes; but finding the severe climate too much, he returned to Europe. His return Milton eagerly and mistakenly took to be a loss of Swedish royal favor because of the effect of the poet's reply. But while Europe, England, and Scandinavia were awaiting the rebuttal of Milton by Salmasius, Regii Sanguinis Clamor appeared anonymously to give the quarrel a new turn. Though Peter Du Moulin had written the work, Milton had received reports that Alexander More, a Calvinist divine of Genevan origin, had composed the book. Despite disclaimers from More conveyed to Milton by responsible persons, including the Dutch ambassador, the blind poet continued the scathing Latin reply in which he denounced More as the author of Regii Sanguinis Clamor. Milton's answer, the Defensio Secunda, accused More of debauching a serving-maid named Bontia while a guest in Salmasius' household in Leyden, and worse yet, of unorthodox religious opinions.

Milton had reason to vent his anger on the author of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, if not on the wrong man. For the book dealt him appalling blows on every point about which he was sensitive. His sight having completely gone while he replied to Salmasius, Milton chose to regard his blindness as a sacrifice made on the altar of Liberty. The dedicatory epistle to Regii Sanguinis Clamor called him a monstrous, blinded Cyclops. The Puritan cause, which besides real patriots had its share of rogues, was zestfully portrayed as a conspiracy of univeling hypocrites with a lust for power and gold. Thus his political idealism, exalted and at moments rather unworldly, was assailed and his whole psychological adjustment built upon it jeopardized. Milton had preached virtue all his life and was, moreover, proud of the recognition shown him on his Continental tour of 1638-39. In Regii Sanguinis Clamor, the trip became an attempt to escape the disgrace of a scandalous expulsion from Cambridge; and his divorce tracts, written out of the unbearable misery of a bad marriage, were mentioned as the work of a chronic trouble-maker bent on splitting matrimony and kingdoms. But most effective of all was a long Latin poem appended to Regii Sanguinis Clamor which completed the demolition of Milton's intellectual ability, learning, and personal character. Bristling with wrath, Milton ignored the evidence presented him and concentrated on annihilating Alexander

More. When the Defensio Secunda appeared in 1654, it sought, besides obliterating More, to vindicate Milton's personal character and the cause for which he was the spokesman. It is sublime alike in its political ideals and personal egotism.

Milton's argumentum ad hominem was something More could not afford to ignore. As a youthful prodigy of Greek learning and a brilliant preacher, he had made enemies as he gradually moved from Geneva to Holland. The aspersions cast by Milton on his character were bad enough, but the doctrinal deviations of which Milton accused him were more serious. To the Reformed Churches of the seventeenth century, orthodoxy was almost the supreme guarantee; in Geneva, the stake and faggots awaited those who deviated, and elsewhere, exclusion at least. When More produced his self-defense in Fides Publica, he made an able answer to Milton, the best he could have done under the circumstances. On a note of injured innocence, he repeatedly deplored Milton's gross language, his willful ignoring of responsible evidence, and especially the egotism running through the Defensio Secunda. Much of the Fides Publica is made up of letters testimonial from illustrious men which clear his personal character and particularly stress his Calvinistic orthodoxy. More such information is added in a Supplementum to the Fides Publica which came out in 1655. From the information in these books, Milton by then must have had misgivings about More's authorship of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, but too much was involved for him to admit a mistake. Consequently, when his Pro Se Defensio was published in 1655, it berated More for defending his innocence. About this time, More privately informed Milton that Peter Du Moulin was the real author of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, but Milton could not afford to confess his error. Since he had supplied fresh scandal, passed on by More's enemies, in the Pro Se Defensio, it was too late to retreat. Fortunately, however, if Milton's charges did not help More's career, they did not ruin it, for, having attained prominence in Holland as a preacher, he was called to the great Huguenot temple at Charenton, near Paris, where he ended his career and was buried.

Dr. Peter Du Moulin wrote in Regii Sanguinis Clamor what is probably the ablest polemic on the Royalist side of the Salmasian Controversy. It does not, be it confessed, blaze into the occasional incandescence of Milton's Defensio Secunda. It has, however, qualities which the works of Salmasius do not possess. For all his immense learning, Salmasius in his Defensio Regia was a philologist, not a philosopher. He presents a full array of standard evidence for the theory of the Divine Right of Kings and, Milton to the contrary, does a thorough piece of research into English law and precedent concerning royal prerogative. But even though his organization is clear and consistent, the Defensio Regia is quite unoriginal and far too long. Because it was written in Salmasius's declining days and was never finished, one may be unfair in criticizing the Responsio ad Miltonum. It is, nonetheless, shapeless and repetitive of the arguments in the Defensio Regia. Its retorts to Milton are sometimes effective, but often, where the poet's blindness is concerned, in bad taste. The Regii Sanguinis Clamor, however, has a bite and mobility which Salmasius never attained. The lines against Milton are a masterpiece of audacious invective.

Du Moulin's mastery of polemics was no accident. He was the eldest son and namesake of Pierre Du Moulin, the celebrated Huguenot preacher and disputant who had engaged a multitude of Catholic adversaries, including Cardinal Bellarmine and the Cardinal Du Perron. The preëminence of Pierre Du Moulin in controversy is due to his unfailing grasp of his arguments, succinctness, and a style of wit, elegance, and point. Walking in his father's footsteps, if never quite under his shadow, Peter Du Moulin manifested some of the same ability in Regii Sanguinis Clamor. In a work of the sort, sarcasm and irony naturally replace wit; but if the sarcasm and irony do not attain that peculiar finesse and polish we associate with Voltaire, they are still withering in effect. His use of invective, especially in the lines against Milton, is masterly. In opposing Jesuit doctrines of popular sovereignty, the right to try and depose kings, and tyrannicide, Pierre Du Moulin had upheld the Divine Right of Kings and submission to them. He had been friendly, though a French Calvinist, to an episcopal form of church government. He had lived and been partly educated in Holland and England. These facts explain how Peter Du Moulin, also educated in Holland and England, wrote with such zeal, though of French extraction, for the English Crown and Anglican Church. They also account for the easy familiarity with which he addressed his book to the Protestants of France and Holland. He, like his father, Salmasius, Milton, and More, was a part of the community of Protestant humanism we have described.

It is out of this cosmopolitan background that all of the works considered here really grow.

Of the authorship of Regii Sanguinis Clamor there can no longer be any doubt. On four occasions Du Moulin claims it with some pride, and on one of them provides an account of its publication which fits perfectly every known fact. In a volume of his Latin poems published late in life he told the full story and reprinted his lines against Milton along with an Ode to Salmasius also found in Clamor. Aside from overseeing publication of the book, Alexander More contributed only the dedicatory epistle appearing over the publisher's name. The style of the epistle is precisely the same puckered Senecan Latin to be observed in the Fides Publica and Supplementum which he avowed. So marked, in fact, is the difference of Latinity between the dedication and the rest of Regii Sanguinis Clamor that one is surprised that even blind Milton did not perceive it when the works were read to him. In any event, Du Moulin, residing in England and Ireland during Puritan rule, was in grave danger if his authorship were immediately known. Rather than risk his head, he allowed the innocent More to suffer the abuse Milton heaped upon him. In this, as in other events of his life, he was a man of singular prudence. Though not an ignoble man, he seldom wasted his time in a fruitless idealism, and if he erred, it was on the side of utility. He occasionally showed bravery and loyalty, but always prudence.

Particularly after the Restoration he became a clergyman of prominence, in favor at Court and resident at Canterbury. He was active in the religious and scientific controversies which then came to a head, looking backward in thought at times but also showing a Calvinistic receptivity to scientific progress. He was an associate of not only leading officials of the Church, but also of such representative figures as Robert Boyle, Meric Casaubon, and Joseph Glanvill. Aside from his personal prominence, he himself is a representative of the large group of Anglican clergy for whom Calvin's theology and Hooker's view of Episcopacy still sufficed.

For a long time there has been a need for a useful translation of Du Moulin's book to present the Royalist side of the Salmasian Controversy, and for a study of Du Moulin and his family which may cast some light on the contribution they, and others comparable to them, made to English life and thought in the crucial period out of which modern times emerged. It is hoped that the translation and information offered here will help supply these needs.

CHAPTER I

ERIT MUNDO LUPUS

It was no accident that Milton's secret adversary, Dr. Peter Du Moulin, was in Regii Sanguinis Clamor his most powerful opponent. The origins of the book were in France, where, to defend their foothold against the pens of Jesuit priests and the swords of Catholic princes, the Huguenots had exploited the resources of pulpit and written controversy. With the fanatic butchery of the St. Bartholomew's massacre (1572) always reminding what failure could mean, the defeat of Catholic theorists, great or small, was for them urgent, the survival of the fittest. Of the Huguenot controversialists of the seventeenth century, none was more skilled or successful than Pierre Du Moulin. What the great Isaac Casaubon was to Protestant scholarship in France, Pierre Du Moulin was to its pulpit; and when faced with grave political and religious attacks abroad, King James I of England sought the talents of both men. Besides personal ties, there was a community of interests, especially religion and scholarship, between Protestant humanists in England and on the Continent. Therefore it was natural that the Du Moulin family, like their many oppressed compatriots, would seek a home and honor in the Isles under Royal protection, and that when attacking Milton, Cromwell, and the Puritans, Dr. Peter Du Moulin should have mastered his father's weapons. In England the Du Moulin family strikingly shows the different ways French Protestant humanism could go-- Dr. Peter, a strong Royalist noted as a neo-Latin poet, Anglican preacher, and friend of the great; Dr. Lewis Du Moulin, a physician who professed history at Oxford and, after a bizarre showing as a Puritan controversialist, came to a pathetic end; and obscure Cyrus Du Moulin, the temporary pastor of the Walloon Church at Canterbury, whose scapegrace son entangled Anglo-Dutch relations in cloak-and-dagger diplomacy. Following the closest in his great father's footsteps was Dr. Peter Du Moulin, and his life showed the influence of his father's long and colorful career. We shall understand him and his times much better for knowing something of his father.

There was no more strenuous warrior for French Calvinism than Pierre Du Moulin. "Athlète intrépide et infatigable du calvinisme pur," it has been aptly said of him, "il soutint d'ardentes controverses, non seulement contre maints docteurs catholiques ou redevenus tels . . . mais contre plusieurs de ses coreligionnaires Dans toutes ces disputes, il déploya un grand zèle pour les intérêts de son église et une activité sans égale; mais on doit regretter qu'il se soit souvent laissé emporter par l'impétuosité de son caractère. Son humeur impérieuse et son talent de spirituel railleur lui firent beaucoup d'ennemis, surtout parmi les Jésuites qui avaient ainsi anagrammatisé son nom: Erit mundo lupus."¹ However lordly his nature, this confident master of verbal swordplay was trained in a hard school, the life of danger into which he was born. It is vividly pictured in his autobiography.

His father was the Huguenot minister Joachim Du Moulin (1538-1615-187),² who on 24 April 1564 married Françoise Gabet, widow of Jacques Du Flessis and daughter of the Royal judge Innocent Gabet, in the Protestant church at Orleans.³ There were four children: Esther, Joachim, Pierre, and Eléazar. Esther was born 10 June 1565, and Joachim on 27 February 1567 while their father was a pastor at Mony.⁴ In 1568, religious wars broke out, and Joachim Du Moulin and his family fled the Chateau de Mony, which had been taken by the Duc de Fosseuse. Moving from place to place to escape the severe persecution, Du Moulin and his pregnant wife arrived 25 September 1568 at Buhy in Vexin-Français. Pierre de Buhy, elder brother of the "Huguenot pope" Philippe de Mornay, took them in; and there Pierre Du Moulin was born at 3 a.m. October 16, and was presented for baptism by the Seigneur de Buhy.⁵ Increasing persecutions in 1569 saw the temporary breakup of the family, and the death of Pierre's widowed grandmother, a Catholic who by her will disinherited his father. Joachim Du Moulin was then at Sedan, where there was a large Huguenot congregation; but when peace was made in 1570 he was called to the Church of Soissons, which met at Coeuvres at the home of Monsieur d'Estrées, a Protestant. The family once more reunited, M^{re}. Du Moulin bore her third son, the ill-fated Eléazar, on 3 December 1570.⁶

On 24 August 1572, the horrors of the St. Bartholomew's massacre spread from Paris throughout France. Ill himself and penniless, Joachim Du Moulin and his sick family were chased from Coeuvres by Monsieur d'Estrées, who had conveniently become a Catholic. Desperate, Du Moulin hid his children in the home of a Catholic nurse named

Ruffine, who loved and would protect them, and sought safety with his wife at Muret, which belonged to the Prince de Conde, four leagues from Coeuvres.⁷ As the murderers approached, according to the DNE, the valiant nurse rattled her pots and pans, pretending to clean them, while hidden away, Esther stifled the cries of the frightened Pierre.⁸ Du Moulin's own recollection, however, omits the nurse's clattering defense:

La maison de cette femme estoit hors du village de Coeuvres, éloignée d'un quart de lieue. Là, vinrent les massacreurs qui avoient charge de nous tuer. Mais cette bonne femme nous jetta sur de la paille et nous couvrit d'un liot et d'un couverture, tellement que nous ne fumes point decouverts.⁹

The family gradually found its way to Sedan, where Pierre and Esther arrived 3 January 1573 in freezing weather. Having suffered too much, his mother soon died there on February 13—"une femme vertueuse et courageuse, et craignant Dieu, qui a souffert beaucoup de maux pour la Parole de Dieu." Pierre was then four years old.¹⁰

Burdened with the care of four children, Joachim Du Moulin on June 12 married Guillemette d'Auvigny, the widow of a pastor named Mercatet. One of their children, Pierre's half-sister Marie, later was married first to a Captain Des Guyots, who was killed fighting with his Picardy regiment at the siege of Amiens in the reign of Henry IV; and then to the celebrated André Rivet, professor of theology at Leyden who supervised studies of the young Prince Henry of Nassau.¹¹

An uneasy peace between the warring factions was made in 1576, and at the Synod of Monty Joachim Du Moulin was sent as a pastor to St.-Pierre Aigle,¹² near Coevres and Soissons. Leaving their children behind at Sedan, Du Moulin père and mère went to St.-Pierre Aigle, only to be forced by renewed troubles to return to Sedan (11 January 1577). After going back to St.-Pierre Aigle the following year, Joachim Du Moulin returned and put his three sons to board with Jean de Vesle, fourth regent of the Collège de Sedan. When in 1580 the Prince de Condé took La Fère, fresh hostilities drove Du Moulin back to Sedan; but soon returning to St.-Pierre Aigle, he boarded his sons with M. Le Fort, second regent of the College.¹³ Thus, at ten Pierre entered the Collège de Sedan for a demanding course of study.¹⁴ The death of the King's brother François de Valois (20 June 1584) at Château-Thierry brought on efforts of the League to exclude Protestant Henry of Navarre from the crown, and in the resulting turmoil Joachim Du Moulin returned with his wife and other children from St.-Pierre Aigle to Sedan. That July young Pierre narrowly escaped death by drowning.¹⁵

It was in the year 1588, when the Armada descended on England, that young Du Moulin would first go there to seek his fortune. Recovering from a serious illness, Joachim Du Moulin had called Pierre, now twenty years old, to his bedside and told him that because of their poverty he could support him no longer, and that when he was well, they would go to Paris, where he was owed some money he would use to provide for his family. On his recovery, the two made the perilous journey from Sedan, then surrounded by troops of the Duke of Guise, to Paris-- the father on horseback, and Pierre afoot, wearing bad shoes in the spring thaw. Joachim Du Moulin received 800 crowns, most of which he placed with Monsieur de Cressi-Rémond, whose son and young Pierre were boarding together. But when Paris, controlled by the Duke of Guise, barred Henry of Navarre on the Day of Barricades, Cressi-Rémond was imprisoned in the Tuilleries, and returning to Paris, Joachim Du Moulin somehow contrived to set up with Rémond an annuity of a hundred livres. Since the gates of Paris were closely guarded, Du Moulin left in disguise with young Pierre walking well before him, carrying their papers and money in case the father should be searched.¹⁶

Then came a scene of parting which, though told years later by a mature writer, still pulses with the heartbreak of a boy:

Je sortis par la porte Saint-Honoré. Mon père vint après et m'atteignit à une demi-lieue de Paris, où je lui rendis ses papiers et son argent. Là, il me dit un dernier adieu. Il me donna douze escus. S'estant séparé d'avec moy, je le suivois de l'oeil tant que je pus, et me mis à genoux sur le grand chemin, priant Dieu pour sa conservation parmi les perils, et pour la prospérité de lui et de sa maison, car je faisois estat de ne le voir jamais. Et demanday à Dieu qu'il voulust m'estre mon père et mon conducteur, puisque je n'avois plus de père sur la terre.¹⁷

Finding upon his return to Paris no means of livelihood there,

Pierre Du Moulin resolved to go to England by way of Rouen and Dieppe. Landing at Rye, he went to London by boat from Graveline, losing his hat in the stormy weather. Life in the British capital was restless for the French youth, for the Spanish Armada was off the coasts, and Queen Elizabeth was soon to send 4000 English troops led by Essex to aid Henry IV, surrounded at Dieppe.¹⁸ So poor he could spend only a sou a day, and grasping for security in a strange land, Du Moulin's aversion to Catholicism was further sharpened by news of the shocking burial alive of his brother Eléazar. Lured perhaps by adventure, Eléazar Du Moulin had left his studies to enlist in troops commanded by M. De La Nouë Bras de fer. While on reconnaissance, a detail of six including Du Moulin were trapped in a house in a village near Senlis, and fought on until all were killed except Eléazar. Catholic peasants were dumping their bodies, stripped nude and despoiled, into a mass grave, when Eléazar, still alive, pleaded for his life and promised ransom. Turning a deaf ear to the wounded youth's pleas, the faithful threw him into the pit with the bodies of his comrades, and buried him alive. He was seventeen.¹⁹

The natural resort of the Huguenot refugees in England was their French churches there, and Pierre Du Moulin frequented them to hear sermons and make friends.²⁰ There he met his future brother-in-law René Bochart, Sieur de Ménillet, who was studying for the ministry to serve the church at Rouen and advised Du Moulin to do the same. Perhaps feeling himself still unprepared, he declined an offer to assist at the French church in London, but through Bochart met Henry Constable, whose father had charge of munitions in the Tower of London. The Englishman liked young Du Moulin, and though declaring himself a Papist upon arriving in France with Essex's army, he promoted Du Moulin's interests with the Countess of Rutland. When her son went to Cambridge, Du Moulin went as his tutor, and there continued his own studies with the learned Dr. William Whitaker and Dr. John Reynolds.²¹ This was the first association of the Du Moulin family with Cambridge and the learned men there.

But in 1591 Du Moulin left the service of the Rutlands to go to Leyden, a university with which the Du Moulins were also to have intimate connections. The Dutch city was becoming a haven for the learned, and the scholars and intellectuals who gathered there will figure prominently later on in our study of the Salmasian Controversy. Du Moulin was approached by M. De La Faye, minister of the Huguenot church of Paris, visiting in England, to serve that congregation, which he hoped to re-establish. Upon Du Moulin's acceptance, he promised him fifty crowns a year. Wishing to visit Leyden, where Franciscus Junius had recently become professor of theology, Du Moulin went to London, and through the French ambassador, M. de Beauvais de Nécle, obtained passage to Zeeland aboard the ship of the Duke of Wittenberg, leaving early in September. The ship was caught in a tempest at night en route, and after jettisoning its cannon and cargo, became so full of water that the wheel was abandoned. But the storm subsided, and the ship put in at Ramenken, held by the English. Du Moulin had lost his clothes and books. Upon his arrival at Leyden, he described the adventure in his poem Votiva Tabella.²²

In Leyden commenced Du Moulin's career as a figure of controversial brilliance, and the agitation of his youth continued in the world of letters. After two months in the Dutch city, his money began to run out, and he found a position as corrector at a college in Leyden, of which one Stokins was the principal. Du Moulin taught Greek, music, and Horace, and his popularity because of his youth aroused the principal's jealousy.²³ Therefore, according to Du Moulin, Stokins got four students to enter his classes masked, and pelt him with snowballs.²⁴ Despite orders from the college governors, the students went unpunished, and fresh incidents so upset Du Moulin that he briefly visited his acquaintance the French ambassador, M. De Buzenval, to recuperate. Upon returning to Leyden, he found that the college governors had ended the impossible situation by discharging him honorably with double a three-months' salary of forty crowns.²⁵

This, however, proved fortune in disguise. When two months later the professor of Philosophy at the University of Leyden—a Scotsman named Ramsey—died, Du Moulin sought the post with the recommendations of De Buzenval and the Princess of Orange.²⁶ With such illustrious patronage, on 8 October 1592 at the age of twenty-four, Du Moulin became Professor of Philosophy there.²⁷ He lectured on works of Aristotle—the Organon, the Physics, De Caelo, De Generatione et Corruptione, On the Soul, and On Meteors, and among his applauding students was Hugo Grotius. Du Moulin was also a colleague of the great

Joseph Scaliger, whom he repaid forty crowns that Joachim Du Moulin had borrowed.²⁸ In addition to lecturing and teaching Greek at the college of Theology, he was a reader in Pindar, and gave private lessons.²⁹ Thus, he was able to write M. De La Faye, who was sending him fifty crowns a year for his commitment to the church at Paris, that he no longer needed the sum.³⁰ News of such success evidently was too much for his old persecutor Stokins, for, Du Moulin tells us, "il fut saisy d'une telle douleur qu'il mourut subitement d'une soudaine suffocation."³¹

After a successful stay of five years and three months at Leyden,³² he returned to France in 1597 to visit his father, whom he had not seen for nine years.³³ In the brilliant young man before him, Joachim Du Moulin did not recognise the boy who had said farewell on the high road from Paris.³⁴ Their reunion was at Jargeau, where Joachim Du Moulin had at last found security under a Protestant governor, and remained until his death in 1618.³⁵ Traveling in France, Pierre Du Moulin had seen many ministers, especially those of the church at Paris. Taken, no doubt, with his accomplishments—and probably remembering the church's contribution to them—they urged him to become one of the clergy.³⁶ Leave such a windfall as Leyden? Du Moulin refused—until De Busenval persuaded him. The ambassador shrewdly played on the challenge offered by a post at Paris: its poverty, hard work, dangers, and the hostility of the Catholic clergy "surtout à Paris qui est un haut théâtre."³⁷ Du Moulin had thrived on danger, always known hard work. As for poverty, to judge from the aplomb and even theatricality of his later career,³⁸ the "haut théâtre" of Paris was enough to offset that. And so the following year, he left Leyden, and after arriving in France in December, 1598, he was taken by his father to Gien. There, after examinations, Joachim Du Moulin joined four other pastors in ordaining his son to the ministry. In January and February, 1599, Pierre Du Moulin served the congregation at Blois, and in March went to Paris, where fame, if not fortune, awaited him.³⁹ There he associated intimately with the great Isaac Casaubon, corresponded with Bishop Lancelot Andrewes, attacked Catholic controversialists, gained ascendancy in Huguenot affairs, and made a reputation which brought him twice to England with honors by royal invitation.

The church to which Du Moulin came was not the great Huguenot temple at Charenton with which his name is associated. Parisian Protestants so far had been allowed to meet for worship five leagues from Paris at Grigny at the home of the Sieur des Bordes Mercier. After being permitted closer worship--four leagues distant--at Ablon in 1601, the congregation settled at Charenton in 1606 by letters patent issued August 1 by the King.⁴⁰ However, the church's inconvenient situation did not retard Du Moulin's rise, for he delivered his first sermon in the home at Soissons of Princess Catherine de Bourbon, sister of Henry IV, and also preached before her at the Louvre. Catherine, wife of the Duke of Bar, immediately named Du Moulin as her chaplain, which required him to conduct her religious services three months a year.⁴¹ Thus he accompanied the duchess on her periodical visits to her husband at his palace in Lorraine, preaching before her on the journey, ironically enough, in Meaux Cathedral and other Catholic churches.⁴²

It was on his first journey to Lorraine with Catherine de Bourbon that love and marriage came to Du Moulin. The duchess and her suite stopped to rest en route at Vitry-le-François, and he stayed overnight at the home of a minister's widow, Marie de Colignon, whom he admired at once. Having to leave the next morning, Du Moulin wrote back to her by the next relay from Bar-le-Duc, and his letter was favorably received. They were married at Vitry, near the end of 1599.⁴³

The death of Princess Catherine in 1604 brought Du Moulin into an embarrassing collision with his later political antagonist, the distinguished Cardinal Du Perron. A persuasive expert at converting notables to Catholicism,⁴⁴ the Cardinal had been sent by Henry IV on such a mission to the Princess's deathbed. As a favorite chaplain, Du Moulin was in attendance at her bedside, and Du Perron, with more zeal than tact, tried to thrust him from the room. Tenacious as usual, Du Moulin clung to the bedpost while the dying Princess remained constant to the Protestant faith, and the disgruntled Cardinal retired.⁴⁵

Loss of his royal patroness, however, did not retard Du Moulin, and by pen and pulpit he rose to celebrity at home and abroad. Though he was at Charenton for twenty-one years until 1620, Du Moulin became very early the masterful figure whose endless list of works had a remarkable vogue. Granting that a minute survey of them is beyond our scope here, yet even in the ones we shall inspect Du Moulin appears primarily as a personage. To understand him as a man, as well as the direction and limitations of his thought, it is helpful to see him together with his associate at Charenton, the scholar Isaac Casaubon. In fact, the names Du Moulin and Casaubon are inevitably linked for two generations in the seventeenth century, and this tie begins at Charenton.

Casaubon was at Charenton for a decade, 1600 to 1610. During his stay there, Casaubon's relationship with Du Moulin showed much mutual admiration and yet was not altogether happy. It needs some re-examination; for, led by sympathy for Casaubon, his piquant biographer Mark Pattison has made influential appraisals of Du Moulin that are shrewd but not always fair.⁴⁶ Indeed, what had Du Moulin become at this time? While conceding his native ability, his power of intellect and eloquence, Pattison seems to view Du Moulin as a disputant who was vain, dogmatic, half-learned--almost a glib sophister. He repeatedly contrasts this unflattering estimate with the breadth and depth of Casaubon's phenomenal knowledge and his scholarly diffidence, particularly in the matter of applying the church fathers to formulation of religious beliefs. Pattison's statements, then, oppose the desirability of an historical scholarship operating with some freedom within and upon the framework of revealed religion, to the practical necessity of defending a fixed system of belief. But the scholar needs his freedom to change conviction, perhaps to suspend it; the apologist or controversialist must have a system as his points d'appui et de ralliement. Though no Casaubon, Du Moulin seems to have been much more than "half-learned,"⁴⁷ and his role as a spokesman for the Huguenots, as well as his earlier life, may help to explain the limitations of his Calvinistic certitude.

Casaubon's diary reveals that for almost their entire decade together at Charenton, he and Du Moulin were on the friendliest terms. To judge from entries extending from 1602 into 1609, Casaubon found Du Moulin's conversation and sermons—despite Pattison's unfavorable account—delightful. And though most of their talks were of religion, Casaubon usually speaks of Du Moulin superlatively as eruditissimus, desiring that Du Moulin's godly counsels make him a better man.⁴⁸ Pious though he was, the scholarly Casaubon would scarcely have remained enthusiastic about the sound morality of Du Moulin's sermons, if the matter of them had appeared hollow. Of two entries for 1609 pertaining to Du Moulin, the second is an account of a communion sermon delivered April 18:

Audivimus Molinaeum quem ego saepe magna cum voluptate
 audiui, nunquam cum tanta: et utinam Deus mihi det perficere
 quod hodie dum illum audirem statui volente Numine.⁴⁹

Until well into 1610, Casaubon, still impressed with Du Moulin's learning and eloquence, gave no hint of a disagreement. But on 26 May 1610, Casaubon wrote John Utenbogaert of his distress at Du Moulin's teachings about the Holy Communion, wherein Casaubon felt he differed both from Calvin and the Church Fathers; and at Du Moulin's rejection of any ancient writers who disagreed with his views.⁵⁰ Specifically, Casaubon singled out the eucharistic doctrine which had appeared in a book by Du Moulin and was commonly heard in Huguenot churches.⁵¹ The book of which Casaubon speaks is almost certainly the 1610 edition of Du Moulin's Apologie Pour la Sainte Cene du Seigneur. Contre La Presence Corporelle, & Transsubstantiation, first published in 1607 and now expanded to answer its Catholic attackers.⁵² Rejection of antiquity, Casaubon says, will gain credit with the half-learned; Du Moulin is deceived, and the Fathers are quite right about this mystery.⁵³ About this time, Du Moulin was maintaining in his communion sermons doctrine which Casaubon thought more new than true--namely that Scripture needed no interpreter.⁵⁴ This the historically minded Casaubon could never accept, finding it dangerous and especially absurd concerning the nature of Holy Communion, the sign of the invisible Church, and the degeneration of the early Church.⁵⁵ Yet he terms Du Moulin "eruditum quidem virum, sed qui videtur in S. Theologia id habere propositum ut nova omnia preferat."⁵⁶ Hearing an "eruditum concionem" of Du Moulin, Casaubon thought that, compared to the doctrine and ritual of Holy Communion found at Charenton, one must admit "veteres aliquando aliter et sensisse de eo sacro mysterio, et longe aliam illius praxin habuisse." He was nostalgic for the faith and rites of the early Church, but felt that, lacking Biblical prescription for them and being only a layman, he had no just cause to urge a change which might encourage superstition, old or new.⁵⁷

What had been a marked difference in views without disrespect of persons sharpened the next month into some personal ill will, especially on the part of Du Moulin. Entering the field of international political controversy, Du Moulin published at Paris in 1610 his Defense de la

Foy Catholique Contenu au livre de . . . Jacques I., Roy de Grand Bretagne . . . contre la Response de N. Coëffeteau, a book defending the English King's theological and political writings against the attacks of Cardinal Bellarmine, the Dominican Coëffeteau, and others.⁵⁸ Obtaining a copy, Casaubon marked what seemed to him major errors in it. He may also have criticized the book verbally, for Du Moulin heard of it and came to the scholar on September 30 to complain of reports that Casaubon had spoken ill of his writings. Casaubon admitted his displeasure at Du Moulin's repudiating, condemning, and vituperating the Fathers. Thereupon, Du Moulin asked for Casaubon's marked copy of the Defense, which was given him with the request that Du Moulin take it in good part.⁵⁹ Rather naturally, however, Du Moulin did not. What Casaubon may have said of the work, we can only infer from his own account; he does not appear to have discussed the book with Du Moulin before voicing public criticism of it.⁶⁰ This oversight, showing some tactlessness in view of their friendship, clearly hurt and angered Du Moulin, and made him show his worse side.

Shortly after their encounter, Casaubon left for England upon an official invitation from the Archbishop of Canterbury received some months before, on July 20. He arrived in England the latter part of October, creating a favorable impression upon Archbishop Bancroft, and, following the prelate's death shortly after (on Nov. 12), upon his successor Archbishop Abbott. King James I, who was behind the invitation, sent for Casaubon on November 8, and thereafter the scholar had a career of royal favor--including a £300-a-year pension--and absorption into the Anglican communion.⁶¹ For this, he had already been prepared by the patristic studies which had intellectually and spiritually made him an Anglo-Catholic before he ever saw England.⁶² With such interests, Casaubon was naturally drawn to the society of Bishop Lancelot Andrewes, just translated to the diocese of Ely, and their growing association was a delighted "collision of learning with wit."⁶³ But Du Moulin also was well known to the Anglican hierarchy, and his distress and anger followed Casaubon across the Channel in a letter written toward the end of 1610 to James Montagu, Bishop of Bath and Wells. Substantially, the letter expressed the hope that the Established Church, by suitable employments, would keep Casaubon in England, where converse with learned men would prevent his slipping into the Roman faith. Thus, he wrote, the Anglican Church would gloriously acquire the "prince of letters," while the French Reformed would avert the scandalous disaster of losing Casaubon to a jubilant Catholicism.⁶⁴

The letter is so important to understanding Du Moulin, and Pattison has made so much of it to his detriment, that it must be examined briefly. Presenting it in an English translation with a key sentence dropped, Pattison uses the letter to paint Du Moulin as a vain, sophistical disputant, and reduces Du Moulin's motive for writing it to the statement that "It was absolutely necessary for Du Moulin's supremacy over his flock, and for his comfort in his pulpit, that Casaubon should be kept away from Paris."⁶⁵ Though the secrecy of the letter may have been unworthy, Du Moulin's motives were mixed enough to deserve our sympathy. The missive notes Casaubon's deviations from Geneva orthodoxy, traces them to an angry feud over financial loss, and describes Casaubon--whose learning is great but character wavering--as ready to fall into Catholicism because of his reading in the Fathers and the clandestine persuasions of the Cardinal Du Perron.⁶⁶ Du Moulin has vainly tried to lead him back to the right way of Calvinism; perhaps the Anglican doctors will have greater success. If Casaubon can in no wise be diverted from his opinions, it would be most helpful and safest to busy him writing about church history and the refutation of Baronius.⁶⁷ Now if, read impartially, the letter in its Latin form reflected only the patristic issue and pastoral zeal, one might suspect the latter to be specious. But Du Moulin writes, with the greatest emphasis:

Denique oro, obtestor, facite, ut quocunque modo vester sit; nam si ad nos redierit [Casaubon], certa est defectio.
Unde ingens Ecclesiae scandalum & offensio infirmorum:
Vivimus enim inter adversarios, qui nostrorum lapsu in-credibiliter triumphant, & ejusmodi Circenses pompas speciose circumducunt.⁶⁸

By omitting the sentence Unde ingens . . . circumducunt, Pattison has distorted the letter's perspective. Whether or not it was comfortable for Du Moulin to have Casaubon in England, the endless efforts the convertisseurs had spent on Casaubon, and the blow the Huguenots would have suffered at his loss, give Du Moulin's statement the sincere urgency of a stout religionist upholding his cause, fearful what damage an erring member of his flock might do to that cause.⁶⁹ It may well be, too, that the usual pastoral zeal of Du Moulin's talks with Casaubon lingered on, despite their disagreement over the Fathers.

Though his aversion to patristic studies and his severe Calvinism may bar Du Moulin from standing as a profound theologian, yet a reading of his works, as well as Casaubon's testimony, surely frees him of the charge of having been "half-learned." He was a preacher who had to maintain something concrete, and a disputant who had to hold the line against Catholic attack. The rigor of his views gave edge to his writings. As a scholar, Casaubon would find this not a breastplate of faith, but a straitjacket. If Du Moulin felt animosity toward Casaubon, he had reason; and his motives for the "delation"⁷⁰ to Bishop Montagu certainly included his usual zeal for the Huguenot cause. One can scarcely forget that the year 1610 saw Henry IV fall under Ravallac's knife.

CHAPTER II

VETERANUM ILLUM CHRISTI MILITEM

FORTEMQUE ATHLETAM . . .

Insecure at best, the Huguenots, because of a bond of faith still felt strongly to exist between the Continental Reformed and the Anglican Churches, had an affinity for England. Besides sharing the community of Protestant humanism, they faced common enemies in the Papacy and the Jesuits. Since churches sought political status and political theories religious sanction, this cultural and religious exchange made controversies international. An inkhorn duel involving basic issues, though emanating from the island kingdom, could become a pitched battle ranging the breadth of Europe. Three times Pierre Du Moulin was a major participant in such struggles. Of his many controversies, we have selected these three, because in them he rose to his zenith as a disputant and made the name Du Moulin influential with the English crown; and during these years his namesake, Dr. Peter Du Moulin, formed as a boy the admiration for his father noticeable in his writings as an Anglican divine. Having enjoyed English hospitality and education in his youth, Pierre Du Moulin as a Huguenot leader was to become famous in England by championing its Church and the Divine Right of Kings. His eldest son later maintained both vigorously against Milton.

The Gunpowder Plot of 1605 and its aftermath touched off a long, confused war of books which lasted through much of the seventeenth century. But though Papal claims and Jesuit political doctrines probably collided most noticeably with the Divine Right theory of the Stuarts during the reign of James I, the general lines of the conflict had already been drawn in the reign of Elizabeth by the Bull of 1570 "deposing" the Queen, and by the Armada of 1588. Opposition to James's succeeding the aging Queen was voiced in 1594 by the Jesuit Robert Parsons in his Conference About the Next Succession to the Crown of England, a book which dangerously tried to undermine James's favorite doctrines of legitimism and Divine Right by asserting that the Crown was held by popular grant; and by attempting to prove that the one rightful claimant to the English throne was the Spanish infanta.¹ James I at first showed moderation toward English Catholics; but in the general alarm over the Gunpowder Plot (1605), he pressed for the Oath of Allegiance passed by Parliament in 1606. The Oath required English Catholics, in swearing allegiance to the King, to deny as 'impious, heretical, and damnable the doctrine that princes excommunicated by the Pope could be deposed or killed by their subjects.² The Oath was shrewdly aimed to drive a wedge between the two factions of English Catholics--the aggressive, led by the Jesuits, who wished speedily to reclaim England for the Faith, and the moderates who yearned for toleration and feared extremists³--and it achieved its purpose. The issue was really far broader than insular fears about the Gunpowder Plot, for influential Catholic writers, especially Cardinal Bellarmine, had maintained the Papal right to depose Kings and absolve subjects of their allegiance, and the doctrine of tyrannicide had come to be associated with the Jesuits.⁴ This latter teaching, coupled with unfortunate praise by the Jesuit Mariana of Jacques Clement, the assassin of Henry III of France (1589),⁵ was converted by both Catholic advocates of Divine Right and Protestants into a loose and alarming doctrine of regicide. Aside from the fear princes might have at such a prospect, the Oath of James had raised another issue basically European. Strengthened by the Counter-Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church was preparing to renew the old struggle between Church and State in a Europe changed by the Reformation into a congeries of national states and state churches, the medieval unity, even supremacy, of the Faith having been fragmented. England seemed the one place where the successful march of Catholicism could be stopped.⁶ In France, the Huguenots were forever apprehensive.

For English Catholics, however, the Oath--though nominally an additional burden to the penal laws in force--might mean in practice a lightening in application of the existing recusancy laws.⁷ But the Papacy quickly saw how the Oath threatened its powers, for it undercut the Pope's claims to temporal and spiritual authority. In a sense, the Oath of James was an advance over Elizabeth's Act of Supremacy (1559), which had denied all Papal authority in matters ecclesiastical or spiritual within the realm.⁸ The Oath of 1606, however, did not touch directly on the Pope's spiritual authority (which Catholics had to recognise), but it required, besides loyalty to James as the rightful King, the rejection of any deposing and absolving power. By not mentioning the Pope's spiritual authority, the Oath apparently recognised the division between spiritual and secular jurisdiction--the doctrine of the two kingdoms. It also forbade the Pope to cross this boundary by using the secular power of deposition under pretext of a spiritual end. This much the English Catholics might have accepted, as being an oath merely civil; but in requiring the Catholic Englishman, layman as well as priest, to condemn as damnable, impious, and heretical the Holy See's power to depose, the Oath of James was sapping the Pope's spiritual authority as well,⁹ and thus inviting attack.

Pope Paul V did not wait, for on 22 September 1606 he issued a Breve flatly forbidding English Catholics to take the Oath, as contrary to their faith.¹⁰ The situation was alarming, for the penalties for refusing the Oath were heavy. English Catholics, however, professed to doubt the genuineness of the Papal Breve, which George Blackwell, the Archpriest, would not publish.¹¹ Meanwhile, Catholics including Blackwell took the oath. With a Breve dated 23 August 1607, the Pope angrily confirmed his earlier letter and bound Catholics to observe it; this was followed by a letter on 28 September 1607 from Cardinal Bellarmine to Blackwell, reproving the aging Archpriest for swearing to the Oath, and urging martyrdom instead. To this, Blackwell replied on November 13.¹² And now King James I entered the lists against the Pope. To answer the two Breves and Bellarmine's letter to Blackwell, James published in 1607 his Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus or an Apologie for the Oath of Allegiance; and though it was anonymous, its authorship was obvious, for it was put out by the royal printer, Robert Barker, and bore the royal arms.¹³ The book received a royal welcome, for Rome's greatest controversialist, Cardinal Bellarmine, immediately answered it by a Responsio ad Librum Inscriptum Triplici nodo, Triplex Cuneus 1608. It appeared under the name of Matthaeus Tortus, one of the Cardinal's almoners,¹⁴ but this book's authorship was an open secret also. Wide reading of the two books made a royal answer necessary, and so James I in 1609 published a new edition of Triplici nodo with his name on the title page,¹⁵ and important supplementary matter to strengthen his case. And at this point erupted two controversies in which Du Moulin played a leading role.

To the new edition of Triplici nodo, James prefixed "A Premonition to All Most Mightie Monarches, Kings, Free Princes, and States of Christendome," and dedicated it to the Holy Roman Emperor Rudolph II. In thus bidding for European support for a common cause against extreme Papal claims, James had to define his own position favorably. Since Cardinal Bellarmine had called him an heretic to whom subjects could not swear allegiance, James included in his 1609 "Premonition"¹⁶ a personal confession of faith designed to prove himself Catholic, though non-Roman, and no apostate. He also added a catalogue of "lies," to be found in Bellarmine's work, and their confutations,¹⁷ and a list of novel doctrines imputed to the Roman Church.¹⁸ The new edition of James's book became an important document in the European paper war over activities of the French Jesuits, the defense of Gallican liberties, and the quarrels of the Venetians with the Pope,¹⁹ and a flood of replies came.²⁰ Of these, a major one was the Response à l'advertissement adressé par le Sérénissime Roy de la Grande Bretagne, Jacques Ier, à tous les princes et potentats de chrestienté (Rouen, 1610) by the famous Dominican preacher Nicolas Coëffeteau—a notable help to the Papal cause from a non-Jesuit source. Du Moulin, equally celebrated,²¹ pounced upon this with his Defense de la Foy Catholique. The book was later answered by Coëffeteau with an Apologie pour la response à l'advertissement du sérénissime roy de la Grande Bretagne,²² which seems to have been anti-climactic.

Speedily translated into English by order of James, Du Moulin's Defense de la Foy Catholique showed the author's real power as a controversialist. It was divided into two books, the first discussing in eight chapters the relative powers of Kings and Popes, and the second defending in twenty-three articles the doctrines of James's confession of faith. Although Book I touches upon many facets of the quarrel, its two main sections are Chapters V and VII; the line of approach is shown by the title "Of the Vsurpation of Popes ouer Kings." Chapter V argues that the Pope has no power over the temporality of Princes, that he cannot take away their crowns or absolve subjects from an oath of fidelity, and that Bellarmine's reasonings are invalid.²³ Having demolished Papal claims, Du Moulin neatly turns the argument in Chapter VII to prove that, on the contrary, emperors and kings have always had authority over the Bishops of Rome—that they have chosen Popes, punished them, degraded them; and that, moreover, princes have always had power over bishops and their temporalities.²⁴ Here, then, Du Moulin clearly aligns himself with those Huguenots who favored the divine right of Kings.²⁵ Because it follows point by point the royal confession of faith, agreeing and justifying as it goes along, Book II is perhaps less interesting for us. It seems logical to believe, however, that Casaubon's distaste for the work may have been aroused most by Articles Two and Three, dealing with the Church Fathers and the authority to be given them; and Articles Nine through Eleven, discussing the Eucharist.²⁶

Concurrently with his 1609 reissuance of Triplici nodo, James I had Bishop Andrewes make a detailed answer to "Tortus" (Bellarmine), which was published the same year with the witty title Tortura Torti sive Ad Matthaei Torti Librum Responsio.²⁷ Cardinal Bellarmine rejoined with his Apologia pro Responsione sua, wherein he acknowledged his own earlier Responsio and answered James's "Prenotition." This book included a new edition of the Responsio.²⁸ But the next year, 1610, Bishop Andrewes replied with his long, elaborate Responsio ad Apologiam Cardinalis Bellarmini, in which he is thought to have had Casaubon's help.²⁹ The next four years saw the appearance of a bewildering profusion of books on both sides, with the Catholic publications extending from Germany to Spain. On the Protestant side, the predictable number of Anglican divines rallied to their King, and amongst the Jesuits such illustrious names as Martin Becan, Suarez, James Gretser, and Leonardus Lessius appeared.³⁰ Becan was still involved as late as 1619.³¹ Du Moulin, however, dipped into the controversy at flood tide in 1614 with his De Monarchia Temporalis Pontificis Liber,³² a work which again commended him to the English crown.

In De Monarchia, Du Moulin expanded the thesis he had developed in the Defense de la Foy Catholique, that the Papacy had by various ruses usurped, or defrauded princes of, an authority to which the Pope, the bishops, and the clergy had originally been subject. Perhaps as well as any other work of his, De Monarchia shows why Du Moulin was valued or feared in an inkhorn barrage. It has the French literary virtues of grasp, clarity, brevity, and point. Compared with the shapeless bulk of most such works--even to an extent those of Andrewes--it has a fine structural clearness as well as sharp mobility of reasoning. Aside from its flowery praise of James I, the dedication to him gives some of Du Moulin's reasons for entering the quarrel again: Catholic accusations that Protestants are inconsistent, especially in the beliefs of Huguenots and Anglicans; attacks made on the Protestant religion in the person of James; and a common cause, in the face of Catholic theories of tyrannicide and deposition of kings, between French Protestants loyal to their King, and James I.³³ After three chapters reviewing the controversy, Du Moulin in Chapter IV attacks the Jesuits by citing fifteen pages of rules and axioms ascribed to them, and purporting to show that their Society was founded for the ruination of Commonwealths.³⁴ He threshes over the familiar arguments about the Order--the Spanish leadership of the Jesuits, their blind loyalty to superiors, their doctrines of deposition and tyrannicide, their claims of clerical exemption from civil laws, Papal assertion of power to absolve subjects of their loyalty, the divine right and holy secrecy of confession, and so on. Chapter V reviews the general encroachment of the Pope on civil power, and then makes specific application to England.³⁵ Then Du Moulin turns to the refutation of Bellarmine's theories. The Cardinal, Du Moulin observes,³⁶ has tried to coat his odious doctrines with palatable distinctions of terms, mere quibbles which Du Moulin will expose as window dressing which really means nothing. The so-called indirect power of the Pope to depose Kings, he says, has "tantundem virium ad deturbandos reges, & transferenda sceptrum quam si directa vocaretur."³⁷ Equally fraudulent, Du Moulin charges, is Bellarmine's claim that the pope has power over worldly things so far as they touch spiritual ones, or are ordered by them.³⁸ This still leaves everything at the Pope's command, he says, "nihil enim est temporale quod non aliquo modo pertineat ad spiritualia."³⁹ The idea that the Pope's temporal power is not temporal in origin, but extends to worldly things from his spiritual commission, Du Moulin finds ridiculous.⁴⁰ This in fact augments the Pope's power. To Bellarmine's plea that he had not denied the divine law of obedience to kings, but had said that each king came of human law, Du Moulin rejoins that Bellarmine cancels himself by conceding a principle but denying its application.⁴¹ If the Pope claims authority over Kings outside his Church, Du Moulin asks, what about the Turk?⁴² Thereafter, in Chapters VII-XIII, Du Moulin seeks to disprove Bellarmine by Scripture, reason, and the Ancient Church. Through Chapters XIV-XVII, Du Moulin contends that the Roman Emperors and Italian Kings had full power over the Pope, that in any nation the clergy was always subject to Kings and Princes, that the Pope had usurped the royal powers of calling Councils and presiding over them, and that later Councils had strayed from earlier form and doctrine.⁴³ Clerical exemptions are attacked through Chapters XVIII-XXII; and next (Chapters XXIII-XXIV) the Papacy is portrayed as succeeding and imitating the Roman Empire.⁴⁴ Du Moulin's parting shot is a discussion (Chapter XXVI) of what artifices the Papacy has used to twist spiritual power and Christian doctrine to its own worldly advantage.

The warfare over James's Oath, as this influenced French politics, involved Du Moulin in a third controversy on behalf of the English crown, in which he was pitted against his old foe the Cardinal Du Perron. In 1614, the year De Monarchia appeared, the Estates-General of France assembled for their last meeting until 1789, and the Third Estate presented a cahier containing an oath to be sworn by officers, churchmen, and others, which condemned the teachings of deposition, rebellion, and regicide in much the same language as the Oath of James. The French clergy labored for suppression of the cahier, and the Cardinal Du Perron was selected to present their views to the other two Estates. The Cardinal's fiery speech⁴⁵ was masterfully done; he agreed that assassination of kings is not permissible and that in their bare administration of temporal affairs they depend on God; but he objected long and systematically to the doctrine that subjects could never be absolved of their oath of loyalty.⁴⁶ His objections were chiefly based on how the passage of this section might divide the Church and introduce schism by causing laymen to give private judgment on matters of faith which only Authority should determine, and by calling that very authority into question; and on how this might bring back the civil wars.⁴⁷ It would, the Cardinal said, rend the unity of faith on which the Church rests, and under its avowed purpose of protecting the King lurked just such an intent.⁴⁸ Compared to this oath, he asserted, the one of James I (whom he flatters) is more sweet and modest.⁴⁹ Then, despite a defense of the oath by Miron, president of the Chamber of the Third Estate, the article was left out of the cahier after the Council forbade further discussion and Louis XIII ordered its omission.⁵⁰

Publication of the Cardinal's Harangue in four editions during 1615, and its status as a manifesto of the French clergy, required an answer. The reply came from James I himself, in a Déclaration du sérénissime roi Jacques I, roi de la Grande-Bretagne, France et Irlande, défenseur de la foi pour le droit des rois, et indépendance de leurs couronnes contre la Harangue d'illustrissime Cardinal du Perron, prononcée à la chambre du tiers-état, 1615. The text was followed by an Advertissement by Du Moulin,⁵¹ who may have helped James with the Declaration. Du Perron prepared two replies to James's book, one of which was published in 1620 after the Cardinal's death under the title Replique à la Responce du Sérénissime Roy de la Grande-Bretagne par l'illustrissime et reverendissime Cardinal du Perron, archevesque de Sens, Primat des Gaules et de Germanie, et Grand Aumosnier de France. The other answer, much longer, was not printed.⁵² It was to rebut Du Perron's book that Du Moulin wrote his Nouveauté du Papisme, Opposée à l'Antiquité du Vray Christianisme. Contre le Livre de Monsieur le Cardinal Du Perron, Intitulé Replique à la Responce du Sérénissime Roy Jacques I. Roy de la Grand' Bretagne (Sedan, 1627).

A large folio of much preliminary matter and more than 1083 pages, Nouveauté du Papisme was undertaken, Du Moulin tells us, at the command of James I, completed as a point of honor after his death in 1625, and then dedicated to Charles I.⁵³ It was written at least in part during a serious illness of nearly two years,⁵⁴ and despite trips and the lack of books. Compared to his treatment of the Cardinal later on, Du Moulin opens with comparative praise for Du Ferron's skill as a disputant, noting his command of language and style, his diligent research into antiquity, his inventiveness, his ability to throw up a screen of obscure words and excessive distinctions, and his mastery of evasion.⁵⁵ Du Moulin's line of attack through the seven books of the work partly branches free, partly develops the contention of De Monarchia and the Defense that Papal supremacy was not an inherent principle of the Church, but instead was the result of conniving by bishops who in the Early Church amounted to little. The Cardinal's second preface Du Moulin dismisses as a mere exhortation to submit to the True Church without specifying which it is, or teaching how to recognize it, or giving necessary instruction in the Word of God.⁵⁶ Book I (in 65 chapters) discusses the church of the elect and the visibility of the church, its capacity for error as shown by Rome. It plays off the relative authority of Scripture and Church, attacks the Papal succession, and finds the Roman position on using the Fathers self-contradictory. The truth and purity of Holy Writ is defended against the Cardinal.⁵⁷ In Book II, of nine chapters, Du Moulin contends that the church visible should not be monarchical, and denies that Peter had jurisdiction over the other Apostles or was monarch of the universal church.⁵⁸ Having laid this groundwork, Du Moulin pursues Church history through Books III-VI to show that, whatever efforts he may have made, the Bishop of Rome was not recognized, even by the time of the Council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.), as the head of the Church; and that Councils were called by the Emperors, not the Pope.⁵⁹ Such examination of the nature and evolution of the Church and its beliefs raises other questions: the problem of Scriptural interpretation, and if interpretation at all, by whom; the weight to be given the Fathers, and which ones. In refuting Du Perron, Du Moulin clearly expressed his mature views. Will Rome give people a sure and infallible interpretation of Scriptures? The Cardinal, charges Du Moulin, sends them to seek the non-existent, since the Church has no one official interpretation of Scripture--rather, many Doctors commenting upon it and disputing among themselves.⁶⁰ To resolve this difficulty, since all agree that the Old and New Testaments are the Divine Word, let the people there find what is necessary to salvation. But Du Moulin's adversaries will ask, who will interpret Scripture; does each man have the divine inspiration to penetrate its meaning? It needs no interpreter, Du Moulin asserts,

Car les choses necessaire à salut sont si clairement couchées en l'Ecriture qu'il n'est point besoing d'inter-prete pour les entendre suffisamment à salut. L'Ecriture nous enseigne que Dieu a créé le monde, que Jesus Christ est mort pour nous, qu'il est ressuscité. Elle commande d'aimer Dieu de tout son coeur, & son prochain comme soi-même. Elle defend de tuer, de paillarder, de desrobber, &c. Pour entendre ces choses faudra-il trouver un interprete infallible? Or ie dis qu'en l'Ecriture les choses qui sont ainsi claires suffisent à salut.⁶¹

This, of course, belongs to moral theology and might suffice, were Scriptural readers not going to inquire about strange or mystical passages. But such a view is open to question for matters more abstruse and requiring exegesis, and it is plainly not enough for those who wish to understand the historical Church and its dogma. Here the patristic issue appears again. Du Moulin charges Du Perron with making conformity with the Fathers, rather than Holy Writ, the mark of the true Church, and with picking out only those Fathers who suit his purpose.⁶² And Du Perron, he says, has marvellously twisted their sense to prove his point:

Si jamais homme eust de la dexterité à gauchir, & à destourner les passages de leur vray sens, Monsieur du Perron en emporte le prix. Par vne souplesse ingenieuse il prend les paroles de respect & d'honneur dites à l'Euesque de Rome, pour paroles de suietien. Il baille les conseils que les Pontifes ont donné à leurs amis pour loix & ordonnances: & les recours des personnes oppressees pour des appels. Et le secours fraternel que quelque Euesque de Rome a donné à vn affligé, pour vne action

de iuge & de souuerain.⁶³

The Fathers themselves are an endless labyrinth of confusion, requiring, Du Moulin asserts, more interpretation than the Scripture they are supposed to explain—discordant, ambiguous, erroneous, obscure.⁶⁴

But there was more. Following his Preface, Du Moulin supplied a seventeen-page "Echantillon de Faussetez et Deprauations de Passages Alleguez par M. le Cardinal Du Perron, en son liure contre le Roy de la Grand' Bretagne. Le lecteur en trouuera plusieurs autres que i'ay remarquees en l'Indice mis à la fin de ce liure."⁶⁵ With a dash of esprit gaulois, Du Moulin spiced the Index to Nouueauté de Papisme with six lists of ignorances allegedly shown by the Cardinal in his book. There were ignorances in Scripture (nine headings), Philosophy (thirteen headings), Greek language and Latin grammar (34 headings), Geography (one), Hebrew (three), and the Fathers and Ancient History (twenty).⁶⁶ Moreover, Du Moulin accused Du Perron of falsifying both Scripture and the Fathers. There are twenty-two headings of Scriptural falsification and a hundred for the Fathers, whom Du Perron is charged with truncating, twisting, falsifying, and deliberately mistranslating.⁶⁷ Indeed, it is a kind of poetic irony that such a monument as this catalogue of "ignorances" was left to the learned prelate who had by similar tactics shamed De Mornay at the Fontainebleau conference of 1600.⁶⁸

Du Moulin's connection with England, however, involved more than writing partisan political works, and brought him into intimate contact with the Crown. Motivated, perhaps, by the desire to lessen Catholic threats by Protestant solidarity, and seeing that this must rest on concord of belief rather than on ecclesiastical structure, James I dreamed of Protestant union. Therefore he wrote to the Huguenot National Synod of Tonneins, which began in May, 1614, to plead for peace and union among all who sincerely professed the Christian faith.⁶⁹ The Synod wrote an appreciative letter to James and suggested a plan for reuniting Protestant churches in belief and adjusting differences between them. Barring any distracting quarrels over rival tenets, it would set up a congress of theologians to formulate a joint confession, a symbol which would be a consensus of the beliefs of the reformed churches of England, Scotland, and the Continent. This creed would omit the more arcane points of faith, about which there was difference, and concentrate on matters of salvation.⁷⁰ James also wished to draw up a plan of reunion, and invited Du Moulin over in 1615 to help with this and other work. Given a most flattering reception, Du Moulin stayed three months. He attended James at dinner, and the King gave him a prebend in Canterbury Cathedral and a benefice in Wales, each worth £200 a year; while Cambridge, where Du Moulin had studied as a young man, conferred a doctor's degree upon him.⁷¹ The plan for reunion on which James and Du Moulin collaborated was amiable but ineffective. "On y remarque," it has been observed, "une modération fort éloignée du caractère de Du Moulin et dans laquelle on doit reconnaître l'influence du roi Jacques."⁷² Though the plan spoke hopefully of peace and concord, it failed because nobody really desired a union for which he would have to make concessions.⁷³

Through the Synod of Tonneins, James I also helped make peace between Du Moulin and Daniel Tilenus, professor of theology at the Academie de Sedan, which was under the protection of the Duke of Bouillon. For some time, the two clergymen had quarreled about how divine and human natures could be united in the person of Christ, and because many churches had become embroiled, the Synod was anxious--even though favorable to Du Moulin--to bury the matter.⁷⁴ King James had David Home, the elderly pastor of Duras, urge Du Moulin to a reconciliation with Tilenus, while the Synod decided on a conference for that purpose at Saumur. There, Du Flessis-Mornay and the professors of the Saumur academy would try to persuade the bickering ministers to end their quarrel in a union of doctrine.⁷⁵ In 1613, however, Du Moulin had issued at Paris a Copie de la lettre écrite contre Tilénus aux Ministres de France. But the efforts of James on one side, and Du Flessis-Mornay and seven clergymen on the other, succeeded, and the two ministers each made a grudging admission of the other's orthodoxy.⁷⁶ As a result, Du Moulin gave up the printing of an Examen de la Doctrine de Tilénus,⁷⁷ but the Lettre had been republished at Schiedam with the printer suppressing an offensive portion. This part appeared anonymously at the Hague in 1617,⁷⁸ but nothing further was heard of the quarrel.

During 1617 and 1618, Du Moulin was busy writing two works whose purpose was domestic--to refute Catholic attacks on the French Reformed faith--but which nonetheless had their effect in England and on his connection with the Stuarts. These books were the Bouclier de la Foi (Charenton, 1618) and De la Vocation des Pasteurs (Sedan, 1618); their relationship is clarified by his correspondence with Bishop Lancelot Andrewes. The central issue is Episcopacy as it affected the ecclesiastical arm of the English government, caught between Catholic and Presbyterian agitation. Du Moulin's eventual position--close to Hooker's and conciliatory to the nascent Anglo-Catholicism of Andrewes--is quoted and developed by Du Moulin's eldest son in the anti-prelatical arguments on the eve of the English Civil War, quarrels in which Milton was prominent.

Few of Du Moulin's controversies failed to include a Jesuit. This one began when Father Jean Arnoux, confessor of Louis XIII, asserted while preaching before the young King that Scriptural passages in the margin of the Reformed Confession of Faith were all falsely adduced. Four clergymen of the Charenton temple undertook the necessary answer, the Defense de la Confession des Églises Reformées de France par les quatre Ministres de Charenton: Montigny, Durand, Du Moulin et Mestrezat, contre les Accusations du sieur Arnoux jésuite (Charenton: Nicolas Bourdin, 1617).⁷⁹ Evidently Du Moulin composed much of the forceful work, for it had immediate effects. One was a flurry of Catholic pamphlets,⁸⁰ some amusing; the other was official action. The dedication of the work, praised as "fort belle et pleine de force,"⁸¹ was addressed to Louis XIII, and sharply reminded the King that his family owed its throne to Protestant swords. This was too much, and Catholic pressure brought an order in council forbidding any future dedications to the King without his permission.⁸² Richelieu, still Bishop of Ligon and as yet neither Cardinal nor Prime Minister, also contributed to the pamphlet war.⁸³ Here the matter halted momentarily, but Roman pressure on the Huguenots did not.

Hardly any aspect of rival faiths was left untouched by partisan thrusts--dogma, sacraments, church polity. From a legal point of view, the valid performance of spiritual functions depended, in general, upon a rightly constituted clergy. To Catholic emphasis upon the Papal succession and validity of Roman orders--supported by evidence from Scripture and the Fathers, Papal and Conciliar decrees, official interpretation, and tradition--was opposed a Protestant stress upon the calling to a ministry set up, so far as possible, in conformity with Scripture only, or at least not contradicting its final authority. On the grounds that the clergy of the French Reformed Churches was being charged with lack of a proper calling, Du Moulin now published a treatise De la Vocation des Pasteurs (Sedan: Jean Jannon, 1618). The charge was made, he wrote, to distract the Reformed faith from its "exposure" of Roman doctrine by the rule of Scripture; but he would defeat the enemy by showing "la validite de nostre vocation, et la nullite & corruption de la leur."⁸⁴ Divided into two books, De la Vocation has Du Moulin's usual combination of a clearly unified organisation, and an elegant edge of style. Otherwise, it generally falls in line with Calvinistic argument, seeking to prove the Scriptural purity of the French Reformed ministry in its structure, vocation, and ordination. While not rejecting Episcopacy per se, it roundly condemns its development in the Roman Catholic Church as a perversion growing from the turning of a spiritual government into a temporal monarchy with worldly gain and power as its objectives.⁸⁵ Since the book was designed for the Huguenot clergy, Du Moulin felt little need for restraint, and went far indeed in his allegations about the Roman Church—so far that without careful reading the book might seem a blast at Episcopacy per se.⁸⁶ Because of his new prominence in England, and the fact that the Established Church was trying to maintain its validity against both Catholic and Puritan, Du Moulin's book could expect careful reading there. Consequently, his argument is worth noting.

He points out that the words Priest and Bishop were interchangeable in the New Testament, that bishops were instituted for good order, and that sometimes there were more than two in one city.⁸⁷ The French Reformed do not use the term, he says, because a bishop now is a prince in the Pope's temporal empire, and a priest is a sacrificer.⁸⁸ Though anciently the power of ordination belonged to bishops, this practice was founded in custom and Church policy, not divine right. Churches have liberty in this matter, he continues, and since such polity is not necessary to salvation, it would be quite blameworthy to trouble the peace of the Church about it. Whenever it is expedient to change something, it should be done by common consent, not by tumult or obstinacy about some particular.⁸⁹ Because heretics rejected parts of Scripture, Du Moulin asserts, the Fathers could not use the Bible as authority in suppressing them, but had to employ history and the Succession. This was possible especially for those Fathers living shortly after the Apostles, when consecutive bishops were fresh in memory. But 1500 years later, it is impossible to use these two arguments with certainty.⁹⁰ By Succession, the Fathers meant continuity of pure doctrine as well as chairs--not a succession of persons, as today, without succession or conformity of doctrine.⁹¹ Succession is no good proof of the true religion, for it does not preclude heresy or idolatry.⁹²

The Jacobean Church was just beginning its theological development from the Church of Elizabeth; and though Du Moulin's foregoing observations were not aimed at it, and Bishop Joseph Hall was not yet championing Episcopacy,⁹³ still, the rather negative character of Du Moulin's remarks, wrapped in his anti-Papal attacks, could not help the Anglican cause. Indeed, if not prominent in context, three of Du Moulin's statements brought a frown from James, and an exchange of letters with Bishop Andrewes.⁹⁴ These were Du Moulin's assertions that the words Bishop and Priest were equivalent, that there was one and the same order of Bishop and Priest, and that--here was the gravest matter--episcopal primacy was by church law, not divine right.⁹⁵ Since it comprises six Latin letters extending from September, 1618, well into 1619, the Du Moulin-Andrewes correspondence becomes too complicated for detailed treatment here; but there are important central issues of theology and biography. In the first letter, Du Moulin wrote Andrewes of the double effect De la Vocation des Pasteurs had produced: King James was offended because it disparaged the episcopal order, whereas the Huguenots complained loudly it had promoted episcopacy, and were angered at Du Moulin's admission that episcopacy dated from the earliest times, and that a clergyman preeminent in a city was called a bishop.⁹⁶ Du Moulin admits all of the offending statements--what else could he do?--but tries to soften their effect. When saying that the names Priest and Bishop were interchangeable, Du Moulin pleads, he was not detracting from the dignity of the episcopal office, for that function could not be interchanged. As to his statement that the order of Priest and Bishop is one and the same, he says the Ancient Church thought so and the Roman Church still does: witness the Roman Pontifical, which treats of the consecration of a bishop, but nowhere of his ordination. Order is one thing, Du Moulin argues, and grade another--as between Bishop and Archbishop. If he did assert that episcopal grade and prerogative was of church and not divine law, it would not be the part of a good and sensible man for a Frenchman living under the polity of the French Reformed Churches to advocate Episcopacy, and thus come under the censure of its synods. To say that it was of divine right would be to brand the Reformed Church as heretical and disturb the conscience of the weak.⁹⁷ Moreover, when he had mentioned the Anglican Church, he did so with honor;⁹⁸ and he asks Andrewes to regard him as one with whom Antiquity has great honor.

Andrewes' first reply gives the gist of his position, which like Du Moulin's, does not greatly change throughout the letters. Admitting that James I had noted the three points mentioned, he first concedes that the terms Priest and Bishop once were used indiscriminately.⁹⁹

When Andrewes then says that James was more concerned by the intent and motive than by the surface statement of Du Moulin, the Bishop shows how suspicious Puritanism for parity of the clergy had made the "English Solomon."¹⁰⁰ Andrewes then steps up Du Moulin's échappatoire for the second argument, namely his distinction between order and grade, ordination and consecration. The use of consecration in the Roman Pontifical, he observes, does not mean that a bishop is the same thing as a priest, though of a higher grade; for there is a fresh imposition of hands, signifying a new order.¹⁰¹ Of the question of Episcopacy by divine right or church law, Andrewes maintains that whatever was done by the Apostles was done by Apostolic right; the Holy Spirit guided them in what they did.¹⁰² The Bishop then adds some objections from his own offended sense of history; the words vocation and pastor used by the Reformed Churches--and Du Moulin's book--are novelties; ancient Church writings use other terms for the ordination of clergymen.¹⁰³ Having asked Andrewes' opinion, Du Moulin is subsequently buried under an avalanche of Scriptural and patristic information. In his last letter, Du Moulin rather unsuccessfully defends his tenets and use of the words vocation and pastor;¹⁰⁴ but the result is not entirely convincing compared to Andrewes' exhaustive reply, which after reiterating James's three objections, rakes over Scripture and the Fathers to elaborate the Bishop's views.¹⁰⁵ It is steeped in Andrewes' veneration for the magic word Antiquity.

The exchange of letters may safely be said to reinforce one's impression of Du Moulin as more of a wily disputant than a theologian; and if there is a faintly patronizing air about Andrewes' letters to Du Moulin, the Bishop still shows considerable appreciation of the Frenchman's equivocal position in the Reformed Church.

But however understanding Andrewes may have been, James's displeasure with Du Moulin's views of Episcopacy brings us again to the Defense of the Reformed Confession which he and the Charenton ministers had written against Father Arnoux. During the latter part of 1617 and early 1618, Du Moulin reworked the defense into a book of his own entitled Bouclier de la Foi,¹⁰⁶ a work of considerable popularity. The method of the book was to take one or more articles of the Reformed Confession at a time, annex a comment of Father Arnoux, and then to refute the Jesuit and to interpret the article. Because of the range of topics covered by the Reformed confession, the book is a compendium, uttered in his prime, of Du Moulin's opinions on many things. Not only was it being composed at nearly the same time as De la Vocation des Pasteurs, but on Articles XXX and XXXI of the Confession the Bouclier de la Foi dealt with the same topics--the prelatical rule of the Roman Church and the calling of pastors. As expected, the book was soon translated into English, first in 1620.¹⁰⁷ It was dedicated to the Prince of Wales, later Charles I. In "An Aduertisement to the Reader," the printer of the translation, Richard Field, shows the reception Du Moulin's views on Episcopacy had in England. "Christian Reader," writes Field, may it please thee to vnderstand, that when two sundry

Editions of this worke had speedily bene set forth in French, the Author was aduertized that some in the Church of England disliked somewhat in it; whereupon he reuiued it all againe, purposing to explaine himselfe in that manner in the next Edition, as should giue full satisfaction. But before that could conueniently be set forth, hauing notice of my intention to publish his worke in English, he sent me the copie, wherein some things he omitted, a few passages he somewhat altered with his owne pen. In one place he incerted two whole leaues, viz. in the 124. Section, wherein at large he setteth downe his iudgement touching Episcopall authoritie, and the discipline of the Church of England. Thus much I thought to acquaint thee withall beforehand, that thou mightest not giue lesse credit to this English copie, though it somewhat vary from the French already published; for nothing is herein added, omitted, or altered, but by direction from the Author himselfe, who hath promised that the next French edition shall be set forth with the like corrections and additions.¹⁰⁸

Du Moulin's explanation of Article XXXI on the calling of pastors is practically an epitome of De la Vocation des Pasteurs (to which a marginal note on p. 355 refers), condensing the same arguments, making the same charges against Rome. The English commentary on Article XXI shows unmistakably the influence of the correspondence with Andrewes, in just the place to thrust it into prominence--the declaration that "We beleue, that all true Pastors, in what place soeuer they be, haue the same authority and equall power, vnder one and the same head Iesus Christ"109 Not only does Du Moulin repeat the arguments that run through his letters to Andrewes, but he also affords a clear example of the bond felt between Reformed churches of different polity in the days before Laud.

The repeated statements of Du Moulin to Andrewes implying that he favored episcopacy but dared not propagate it among the French Reformed may easily sound like mere expediency, and thus they raise the unpleasant question of whether Du Moulin tailored convictions to patronage. His motives, however, seem to have been understandably mixed. It is evident that he personally wished to keep James's favor, but it is also apparent that he wanted to preserve the bond between English and French Protestants. Arnoux had objected to Article XXX that it "introduceth anarchie, diuision, disobedience, and disorder into the house of God, and ouerthroweth the manner to gouerne established by diuine Law"110 Du Moulin supports the equality of pastoral functions, and adds:

. . . But as touching Ecclesiasticall policie, we do not refuse to acknowledge those for pure and true Churches, where this equalitie is not obserued: because we esteeme not this order to be a point of faith, nor a doctrine tending to saluation. We liue (God be thanked) in brotherly concord with the neighbour Churches which obserue another forme, and where Bishops haue some superioritie.¹¹¹

The obvious Catholic strategy was to split Protestant unity by emphasizing differences in polity. How could Du Moulin avert this? First—as above—by maintaining that polity is really an ἀδελφότης, secondary to the doctrine and faith about which the English and French churches agree. Secondly, by demonstrating that different polities do not practically affect the community of the two churches.¹¹² Thirdly, by asserting that "if sometimes we speake against the authoritie of Bishops, we condemne not Episcopall order in it selfe, but speake onely of the corruption which the Church of Rome hath induced into the Bishopricks, making it a temporall principalitie, depending vpon the Papall Throne."¹¹³ And lastly, to justify the different Protestant church governments by necessity and national exigencies.¹¹⁴

Du Moulin's statements are, of course, clearly intended to dispel misunderstanding, and to placate James and Andrewes, and to keep the royal favor. His success is clear from his later commission to write the Nouveauté du Papisme. But a further and sincere purpose was preservation of the vital unity between the two Protestant bodies under Catholic fire, and permanently to identify the interests and unanimity of the Anglican and French churches. That he achieved some success here is evident from the use made of his comments nearly twenty years later by his son Dr. Peter Du Moulin against another attempt, this time

Presbyterian, to break the tie between Anglicans and Huguenots, and instead to equate the Huguenots with the Covenanters. Already an Anglican divine but still much aware of his French origin, young Du Moulin wrote a book to destroy this equation, a work in which he quoted the very passages we have discussed.¹¹⁵ He makes his father appear almost a strenuous champion of Episcopacy in the Buckler:

There also hee complaineth, as farre as hee may, of the disorders that follow equalitie, relating and allowing the just objections of the English Clergie in these words: they say, AND THAT WITH GOOD REASON [Capitals Du Moulin's], that no societie¹¹⁶

How can one say more, living under a different Discipline? Any man may perceive, that hee speaketh feelingly, as one that had an especiall knowledge and experience of the inconveniences of his Discipline: And that hee thinkes more yet then he saith.¹¹⁷

Because we are examining that part of Du Moulin's career related to England, which helps to explain the writings of his eldest son, a lengthy review of his activities in the French Reformed Church is not à propos. His connections with the Synod of Alais and the National Assembly of La Rochelle in 1620 are significant. Under his presidency, the Synod of Alais condemned the teachings of Arminius, and the Synod's relationship to the Assembly raised the question of the obedience to kings which had become a crux of religious controversy.

It was indeed a critical moment for the Huguenots when the Synod of Alais met from October to December, 1620, in the Cevennes mountains. For years, the Catholic hierarchy had pressed for the official restoration of the Faith in strongly Protestant Béarn. Even after turning Catholic, Henry IV had rebuffed the bishops' importunities, but Louis XIII took an opposite view. Much more than Roman Catholic worship was involved, for the hierarchy demanded that church revenues now Protestant be restored to the Catholic Church. On 25 June 1617, Louis XIII by an order in council granted both demands, autocratically violating the constitutional rights of Béarn. Though the King assured the Protestants of freedom to worship and promised financial support for Huguenot establishments to replace the seized revenues, Louis' record of bad faith inspired little confidence. Therefore, the Béarnese considered resistance, and Louis invaded the principality and entered Pau as if he were a victorious enemy. Eventually, the results were disastrous to the Huguenots.¹¹⁸ Under this ominous cloud, the Huguenots assembled in the mountain town under the leadership of Du Moulin. Of the acts by the Synod of Alais, three are of especial concern here. One was an oath expressing the inseparable unity of the Reformed Churches and their complete loyalty to their confession of faith and their discipline.¹¹⁹ Led by a cautious group of ministers, among whom Du Moulin probably figured,¹²⁰ the Synod refrained from issuing a forceful statement to back the Assembly of La Rochelle, then considering a defensive war against Louis XIII. This conservative view brought accusations that royal gold had bought some members, and the Béarnese deputies cried they were betrayed.¹²¹ And finally, the Synod read and approved the canons of the Synod of Dort, condemning the teachings of Jacob Arminius (1560-1609), who had opposed the doctrine of unconditional predestination of Calvin by stressing free will as an element in salvation.

Du Moulin had a strong personal interest in this action. Commissioned earlier by the Synod of Vitré to attend the Synod of Dort, Du Moulin and the other deputies were overtaken at Geneva, en route to Holland, by an order from Louis XIII forbidding them to proceed.¹²² The Synod of Dort met in late 1618 to early 1619, but at the beginning of 1618 Du Moulin had impatiently sent to press his attack on the teachings of Arminius, the Anatome Arminianismi. Judging this premature, Du Moulin's colleagues vainly tried to persuade him to delay the printing; and when they failed here, they obtained from the provincial synod on 14 May 1618 a decree holding up publication until after the Synod of Dort had closed.¹²³ Consequently, Du Moulin presided over the Synod of Alais with such gusto that he was accused of usurping a papal authority.¹²⁴ However Du Moulin may have viewed Episcopacy, he was fiercely against the Arminian tendencies which were beginning to color Anglican theology.¹²⁵

Dedicating his Anatomie of Arminianisme to the States-General of the United Provinces, Du Moulin sulphurously attributed the rise of Arminianism to the Author of Evil himself:

Sathan, that hee might hinder the course of these prosperous affaires, hath for many yeares tryed outward forces:

From which enterprise being driven, he hath betook himselfe to craftie subtilties, and to intestine dissensions: having gotten men, who affecting novelty, under the pretence of Pietie, have torne the bowels of their owne Country and Church. Pittifull was the sight of your Provinces: The enemy of salvation did brandish amongst you the fire-brand of deadly dissention: A tumultuous tragedy was acted on the Theatre of Belgia, your adversaries beholding it with much pleasure: Finally, wee saw your Common-wealth shaking, and your estate almost desperate, had not God appearing, beyond all expectation, turned away this imminent destruction by timely and seasonable remedies¹²⁶

The remedies were, of course, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, than "which Synode for many ages past there hath beene none more famous, more holy, nor more profitable to the Church."¹²⁷ Du Moulin portrays school debates over Arminian tenets becoming a tumult which passed from pulpit to barbershop, "Whence hatred hath been bred into the people, and pietie is turned into contention, and obedience towards Magistrates is more slack";¹²⁸ but, thanks to the States-General, "the flame of so great a fire is abated, liberty is recovered, the Commonwealth is settled, the universitie purged, and truth, which in many places durst scarce open the mouth, or else was disturbed by contrary clamours, broke through the obstacles, and . . . shone more cleare by the very conflict"¹²⁹ But what are the "unavoydable evils" whereby the Arminians "enwrap mens consciences" and abet Satan?

. . . For hereby is man puffed up with pride, teaching, that man can separate himself; that he can convert himself: that he can convert himselfe before he be converted in act by God: that man hath whereof he may boast: that God is bound to give him sufficient grace: that God doth give to man, what he is indebted to him: that the grace of God is not the totall cause of faith: that the grace of God is subjected to mans free-will. And on the other side Arminianisme doth vex mens consciences with a careful doubting. For who can be certaine of his salvation, if our salvation is not certaine by the Election and decree of God? And if the number of the elect be not certaine by the will of God?¹³⁰

The rigidity and Calvinistic certitude which this shows may really preclude Du Moulin from being in the best sense a theologian; and the fact that he approved of the intellectual straitjacket made in Dort, and of the sorry events following the Synod, is not pleasant. His background, however, accounts for much; and it was his power as a disputant which put him on familiar terms with the Anglicans to whose doctrinal leanings he was unsympathetic.

Returning from the Synod of Alais, Du Moulin was forced to quit Paris for Sedan, where he became alarmed at the Assembly of La Rochelle's drift to war, and wrote to it on 12 February 1621, urging a moderate course. Admitting the justice of Huguenot grievances, he said nothing of submission because of the Divine Right of Kings, but gave instead a shrewd appraisal of the Protestant internal weaknesses which resulted in eventual failure:

Pardon me, Gentlemen, if I tell you that you shall not find all our Protestants inclined to obey your resolutions; and that the fire being kindled, all about you shall remain helpless beholders of the ruins which you have drawn on our heads. Neither can it be unknown to you, that many of the best quality among us, and best able to defend us, openly blame our actions holding and professing, that suffering for this cause, is not suffering for the cause of God. These making no resistance, and opening the gates of their places, or joyning their Arms with the Kings, you may easily judge what loss and what weakening of the party that will be. How many of our Nobility will forsake you, some out of Treachery, some out of weakness? Even they who in an Assembly are most vehement in their Votes, and to shew themselves Zealous, are altogether for violent ways, are very often they that will Revolt and Betray their Brethren. They bring our distressed Churches to the hottest danger, and there leave them, going away after they have set the house on fire.¹³¹

As Du Moulin warned, so it happened. The Assembly of La Rochelle plunged on its ruinous path, drawing up on 10 May 1621 a plan for carrying on defensive war against the King. It was cumbersome, and the entire proposal ignored the unpleasant realities which Du Moulin had pointed out. Of the eight generals drawn from the high Protestant nobility and assigned districts, only two--Soubise and Rohan--served with the necessary zeal.¹³² Conduct of the First Huguenot War was further hampered by selfish fears of the nobles, and dissensions in the Assembly itself had alienated popular support.¹³³ Moreover, the people could hardly be aroused to fight in such a war, when for years the Huguenot clergy had extravagantly taught the theory of the Divine Right of Kings and had dinned into their congregations the doctrine of non-resistance to higher powers.¹³⁴ Among the other tragic results of the war was the burning of the beautiful Huguenot temple at Charenton by a Paris mob angered by the death of the Duc de Mayenne at the siege of Nantauban.¹³⁵ Thus disappeared the great edifice in which Du Moulin had preached and Isaac Casaubon worshipped.

Du Moulin's prophetic letter was written from Sedan, with which his name was associated for the rest of his life. To this city he was compelled to flee because of the aftermath of a letter he had written to James I. In 1620 Edward Herbert, first Lord Herbert of Cherbury and then the British ambassador at Paris, persuaded Du Moulin to write King James on behalf of the Elector Palatine in connection with current affairs in Bohemia. In his letter, Du Moulin stated that the eyes of European Protestants were turned, in their misery, to the English King. Upon returning to Paris from the Synod of Alais, Du Moulin was informed that the highly secret communication had been divulged, perhaps through the treacherous agency of the Duke of Buckingham, and that he was in trouble: the letter had been taken as a plea for James to interfere in European religious conflicts.¹³⁶ Fearing arrest, Du Moulin took the advice of Lord Herbert and fled Paris for Sedan, where the Duc de Bouillon appointed him tutor to his son and pastor of the Huguenot church there. In October, 1621, the Académie de Sedan named him professor of theology.¹³⁷ It was at this time that the Cardinal Du Perron's Reply to King James's Declaration was causing a stir.

Needing Du Moulin's talents to answer the Cardinal, James brought him to England to compose the work eventually called Nouveauté du Papisme, which we have already considered. Du Moulin made the trip either at the end of 1623 or early 1624, and remained in England until the death of James in 1625. Official machinery turned late in 1623 to facilitate the visit, for on October 13 Secretary Conway wrote to Secretary Calvert that "Leave is to be obtained from the French King for M. du Moulin, now at Sedan, to come to England, to settle the deaneries bestowed on him by the King, and to remain or not, as he pleases. The former directions thereon [for the Duke of Bouillon] were by mistake."¹³⁸ There are few records for the early part of 1624, but a letter to Du Moulin by Secretary Conway on September 2 from London reveals that several benefices had been conferred upon him, and that he was seriously ill. Through the Secretary, James expressed his grief, and assured Du Moulin that his two sons should have the benefices after his decease.¹³⁹ On September 9 a warrant was issued for payment to Du Moulin of £100 of the King's free gift, which must have eased Du Moulin's mind. Some weeks later, a living worth £200 had been conferred upon Du Moulin, but name of the living, the diocese, and the person to whom he must apply for the funds had been overlooked, necessitating a letter of November 8 from Du Moulin to Secretary Conway in London. In any event, money came, for on November 20 Richard Oliver, servant to the Duke of Buckingham, had obtained a receipt from Du Moulin for £200 made as a free gift from the King.¹⁴⁰ A letter from John Packer to Conway dated November 27 at Westminster reveals that Du Moulin had been recommended for the Deanery of Ripon, if it could be held without residence.¹⁴¹ However, on 11 January 1625 Du Moulin was presented to the rectory of Llanarmon in the diocese of St. Asaph, voided by the promotion of its rector, the famous Dr. Godfrey Goodman (1583-1656), to the bishopric of Gloucester.¹⁴² Meanwhile, Du Moulin was also serving as pastor of the French church in London. At some time after James's death on 27 March 1625, Du Moulin left England and returned to Sedan.¹⁴³

There Du Moulin stayed until 1628 when, after petitioning Louis XIII with support of the Synod of Castres, he was allowed to return to Charenton.¹⁴⁴ When war broke out again in France that year, he left Charenton, and by November was at the Hague.¹⁴⁵ Thence he returned to Sedan, where he was undisturbed the rest of his life, even when that principality was annexed to France in 1642.¹⁴⁶ As the time passed, his career of teaching, preaching, and writing almost innumerable controversial works continued.¹⁴⁷ There are several interesting glimpses of his later years.

One of them is a sequel to the writing of the Nouveauté du Papisme. Writing on July 20/30, 1630 from Sedan to the Dowager Duchess de la Tremouille, Du Moulin recalled his composition of the book and its dedication to Charles I. By Secretary Dorchester, Charles I thanked Du Moulin and promised to gratify him on any occasion which might arise. Being old and with ten children, Du Moulin wished to secure from Charles the survivorship for his son Cyrus Du Moulin of his prebend at Canterbury, which was bringing in 1000 francs a year.¹⁴⁷ On July 28/August 7, Du Moulin wrote further to Secretary Dorchester that he was not worthy that a person of Dorchester's quality should convey the royal approbation.¹⁴⁸ The Paris lawyer Claude Sarrau, however, has two rather diverse entries in his letters, which contrast sharply with this touching picture of an old man concerned about his survivors. When writing to Vincentius Fabricius in March, 1640, Sarrau had painted Du Moulin as "veteranum illum Christi militem fortemque athletam",¹⁴⁹ but to Salmasius, on 11 June 1649 from Paris to Leyden, he gives a picture of Du Moulin in his shaky old age as a man who has deserved well but outlived his usefulness, and whose vanity has a more pungent fragrance than his piety. Compared to the startling language which Sarrau uses, not even the Jesuits had said such things of Du Moulin.¹⁵⁰

One could wish, however, a happier close to a long career than Sarrau's tart account. And perhaps, with its emphasis on making a godly end to things, the seventeenth century pays the best farewell one could to a man whom contemporaries regarded as a Gospel athlete. William Bates's Latin biography records that on 20 February 1658 Du Moulin gave his last sermon, choosing as his text Psalm 16:7--"I will bless the Lord, who hath given me counsel: my reins also instruct me in the night seasons." Speaking with deep feeling, Du Moulin was inadvertently delivering his own funeral oration.¹⁵¹ Upon his return home, the old man took to the sick bed from which he would not rise, and there taught and consoled himself and bystanders, "Scripturam in ore perpetuo habens, & preces ardentissimas fundens"¹⁵²

As eighteen days wore on, Du Moulin continually uttered pious remarks to strengthen the attendants' faith. His last hours came on 10 March 1658, when he was heard saying, "I hasten to my God and Father—I see my God—O how beautiful is His nature!"¹⁵³ And he died, extending his arms as if to greet the Divine beauty he seemed to behold.

CHAPTER III

MILTON'S SECRET ADVERSARY

Dr. Peter Du Moulin in Dangerous Times

(1601-1659)

If Pierre Du Moulin on his deathbed glanced back over his ninety years of strenuous activity, he may well have felt justly pleased at the illustrious personages whom he had known and the great issues in which he had engaged. His devotion to the Huguenot cause and the Reformed Faith had never swerved. A man of action rather than a scholar, and perhaps, as a strong Calvinist, essentially lacking in a balanced historical perspective, he maintained much and did so effectively. He was a master of dispute and far more than a mere rhetorician. For England, he had considerable affection: it had been the haven of his poverty-stricken youth; and the works he wrote supporting the Crown and the Anglican Church, though they brought him rewards, are not the performances of a hireling. To his eldest son, during these years an impressionable boy, the future was clearly to be found across the Channel.

Within the complex of his father's life we shall find the influences which made Peter Du Moulin probably the most able Royalist opponent of John Milton. And though these influences are clear, Peter Du Moulin is much more than a pale imitation of his father, or than a mere Philistine who jeered at the English Samson grinding in Gaza. Because of his close ties with the great of his time, Peter Du Moulin figured prominently in activities ranging from politics through witchcraft to the New Science. In an age of bickering, he appears pleasantly as a Calvinist who really welcomed science and did not therefore fear atheism. As a neo-Latin poet, he had considerable ability, and even his "practical" works often have creative touches which are refreshing. His personality is sometimes winsome. And if a saving grace were needed, he possesses it--amongst grimly posturing spiritual gladiators, he had a sense of humor.

Since there are few records and hardly any personal utterances concerning his early years, we are perforce left with the picture of a boy who admired his celebrated father and moved where need or danger required. Peter Du Moulin was born at Paris on 24 April 1601, during his father's years of prominence at the great Huguenot temple at Charenton and association with Isaac Casaubon.¹ The growing Du Moulin family was made up of a sister and four brothers of Peter--Joachim (b. 1602), Esther (b. 21 September 1604), Lewis (b. 25 October 1605), Cyrus (b. 2 September 1608), and Samuel Du Moulin (n.d.).² It was during this period at Charenton that Peter Du Moulin formed his life-long friendship with Meric Casaubon, which was a notable feature of their later years together on the staff of Canterbury Cathedral. As to Peter Du Moulin's early education, we can only conjecture; but, to judge from his later works, it included intensive grounding in Latin and a fair amount of Greek. During these years, too, his interest in England was aroused, for he must have wondered at his father's memories of his youth adrift in Elizabethan London, and of student days at Cambridge. An even deeper impression must have been left on the fourteen-year-old boy when the elder Du Moulin returned to his admiring family and friends in 1615, with familiar accounts of collaboration and dinners with the English King.

When Du Moulin fled Paris for Sedan in 1620, the family evidently joined him there. In 1623, young Peter Du Moulin upheld three theses at the Académie de Sedan, where his father was professor of theology. They were De Votis, maintained with his father presiding at the function, and De Angelis and De Veris Peccati Poenis, both defended with Rambour in the chair.³ The following year, Pierre Du Moulin was in England at the behest of James I to compose the Nouveauté du Papisme, remaining there into 1625. At some time during this period, Peter Du Moulin also went to England to make acquaintances and to study under "des professeurs les plus renommés,"⁴ probably at Cambridge.

His attention turned toward the ministry, and in 1625--rather surprisingly, after imprisonment at Dunkirk--he was appointed to the living of St. John's Church, Chester, a post which his father had refused. There is, however, no trace in the church books that he resided there.⁵ His movements for the next few months are obscure, but it may have been in March, 1625, that he was named sinecure rector of Llanarmon in Yale, County Denbigh.⁶ Young Du Moulin had decided to remain in England, for on 31 March 1626 a preparatory signet letter of denization was issued for him--a grant which, however, was unexplainably not completed until 23 May 1633.⁷

About 1628 Du Moulin began serving as chaplain to Lord Strange, continued his studies, and had become known to the Bishop of Exeter.

These facts emerge from a letter, dated 3 February 1631 at London, which Du Moulin wrote to his father's correspondent, Secretary Dorchester, to free himself from accusations of being a lazy pastor. Still worse, Du Moulin wrote, King Charles was "leaning unto a bad opinion of the writer, some one having represented him to be a lewd and debauched fellow." His enemies, according to Du Moulin, had represented him "as consuming an ecclesiastical benefice in idleness."⁸ The benefice--whether it is St. John's or that at Llanarmon is not clear--brought in £80 a year. Vindicating himself, Du Moulin gives Lord Strange and the Bishop as character references, and mentions the disfavor "of his father in France for his devotion to the service of King James, which is known to Lord Carlisle." If thought worthy of his Majesty's good opinion, Du Moulin pleads, he "would be more earnest for employment than recompense."⁹

Evidently he cleared his name of the charges of sloth and debauchery, for in 1633 Peter Du Moulin obtained a new rectory and a wife. The new position was at Witherly in Leicestershire;¹⁰ as yet, no record has appeared of the romance and courtship which led to his marriage. The official entry is dryly succinct:

Moulin, Peter du, clerk, of St. Martin-in-the Fields, bachelor, 33, and Anne Claver, of Foscott, Bucks, spinster, 27, daughter of Matthew Claver, deceased, consent of her mother, Jane Claver--at St. Martin-in-the Fields. 7 May, 1633. B.¹¹

The hopes, joys, and fears of the newlyweds can only be conjectured; but as yet, there was little reason to feel insecure about the future. The elevation of William Laud that year to the archbishopric of Canterbury was ominous to the Puritan intellectuals who urged, with more or less learning, a more thorough, godly reformation of the Established Church; and to the "affectionate" preachers who, with histrionic abandon, were attracting crowds to the drama of man's struggle for salvation—that warfare of the spirit which was soon to spill blood on the fair fields of England.¹² Apparently the only blemish on Du Moulin's happiness at Witherly in the mid-thirties was an obscure litigation extending from April into October, 1635. Neither the cause of the suit nor its outcome are as yet clear, but "Peter du Moulin, clerk, pretended rector of Witherly," appeared before the Court of High Commission, along with Thomas Claver, Edward Claver, Ralph Hunt, Christopher Leister, Henry Dunithorpe, and Richard Nocke. The suit was initiated on April 30, and the last entry for it is the issuance of a commission to examine witnesses, dated October 15.¹³ After this glimpse, we lose sight of Du Moulin and his wife in the groundswell of events leading to the outbreak of the Civil War. The previous year had seen the performance of young Milton's Comus at Ludlow Castle, and two years afterward (1637), Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton lost their ears and were fined £5000 for writing and publishing scandalous and libelous books against the state.¹⁴ John Lilburne was whipped in London, and riots broke out in Edinburgh when Archbishop Laud tried to replace Knox's Book of Common Order with his new prayer book. Milton published Lycidas (November), his first great attack on prelacy,¹⁵ and Hampden's Ship Money Case went to trial, dragging on into the next year. Amidst such events, the life of a country parson easily became obscure.

During 1639, the policies of King Charles I toward his Scottish subjects and their Presbyterian faith resulted in strife which produced Du Moulin's first publication of any importance. Determined to preserve their national religious identity, the Scots in the winter of 1637-38 entered into a Covenant to defend their religion and resist Laud's prayerbook, which "had received the finishing touches at Lambeth and had been sent down ready-made for use, like a sack of English goods."¹⁶ Consequently, the First Bishops' War broke out, ending with the Treaty of Berwick on June 18. The following year, the Short Parliament (April 13-May 5) insisted on debating royal prerogative instead of voting funds for a campaign against Scotland, and Charles I dissolved it. By the time the rag-tag English army moved mutinously north in the Second Bishops' War, the Scots had realized that English public opinion was on their side and sent an army across the Border into England, seized Newcastle, and threatened London. This war ended with the Treaty of Ripon, confirming Presbyterianism in Scotland. Moreover, Charles, with an indemnity and a daily allowance for their soldiers, had to pay the Scots to leave England. To stave off bankruptcy and invasion, he summoned the fateful Long Parliament.¹⁷ The Treaty of Ripon was signed October 21, and the Parliament met on November 3.

It was a militantly Puritan Parliament which met, and it quickly settled down to business. The Earl of Strafford, fresh from his despotic rule of Ireland, was arrested November 11, and old Archbishop Laud was thrown into the Tower. On December 11, the lengthy Root and Branch Petition for ending episcopacy was received by Parliament for debate. As the year 1640 ended, the Presbyterians of England were on the offensive. Naturally, they sought the endorsement of those foreign Reformed Churches on whose Calvinistic model they wished to refashion the Church of England.

Meanwhile, Du Moulin, who was evidently still holding his living of St. John's, Chester, had taken a D.D. degree at Leyden,¹⁸ and was turning his attention to winning foreign support for the Anglican faction. We have seen that his father had been anxious, some years before, to propitiate the English King and hierarchy when they frowned upon some of his statements about Episcopacy; and that in mollifying them, he did so because of a real desire to preserve the community of doctrine and interchange between the French Reformed and English Churches. His son Dr. Peter Du Moulin, now a loyal clergyman of the Established Church, had the same view. The political wisdom of such a Protestant bond was quite evident to King James and to Bishop Andrewes, but not to Charles I and Archbishop Laud. And so the King and his pontifex maximus followed a course of action which impaired the strong Royalist sympathies of the Huguenots and, to some degree, of the Dutch Reformed.

This was done, where foreign Reformed Churches were concerned, by hardening the Jacobean theory that Episcopacy was the preferable, if not essential form of church polity, into a doctrine of its necessity. Growing gradually from this was the requirement that Reformed ministers entering the Anglican Church receive episcopal reordination.¹⁹ Nor was this all. Because of the persecutions in France, many Huguenots had fled to England. Despite their hard lot, they had been loyal to the French King, and now as English residents they were predisposed to the Royalist side in the oncoming conflict.²⁰ But unable to bridle his episcopal enthusiasm, Laud curtailed the liberties of the churches the refugees had set up in their new homeland, and sought to herd them into the fold of the Established Church.²¹ This, too, had its effect upon the Continental churches. For though the English quarrels were not yet drawing the acute interest which their sensational developments provoked later, French and Dutch Protestants were responsive to these events, and there was some division of opinion about them abroad.²²

To such cross-currents of international opinion, Peter Du Moulin was highly sensitive. We would expect this from his father's Anglo-French background; and even as an Englishman, the son for many years would be aware of his Gallic antecedents and Dutch education. He was therefore especially qualified to justify the Royalist position abroad, and such was the purpose of his three earliest works of any importance.

In the latter part of the sixteenth century, France and Scotland had been intimately connected. Mary Queen of Scots had been closely tied to the House of Guise, the French crown, and the interests of Catholicism. And Reformed Scotland, where Mary's son was continually reproved by the Kirk's bony finger, kept up its contacts with French Protestantism. When the Bishops' Wars of 1639 and 1640 began to make French Protestants wonder about possibly sinister intentions of the English crown, Peter Du Moulin tried to undercut the Scottish Covenanters' propaganda in France with his first book. It was entitled A Letter of a French Protestant to a Scottishman of the Covenant. VVherein one of their chiefe pretences is removed, which is their conformitie with the French Churches in points of Discipline and Obedience. London, Printed by R. Young, and R. Badger. 1640.²³

Dated "Chester. March 1. 1639./ 11. 1640," the Letter of a French Protestant is signed "Your friend and servant in Christ, Peter Du-Moulin the sonne."²⁴ After pointing to the long connection between France and Scotland in matters of state and the Protestant churches of both kingdoms, Du Moulin nonetheless wishes "that our example be not mistaken, and abused to our disparagement, and your ruine, and the perpetuall disgrace of Christian Religion."²⁵ Rather naturally, Du Moulin wishes to strengthen his case by personal experience. Of his own credentials, he asserts that "although I am happily engrafted into the body of the Church of England, I may be admitted in this case to speake as a Frenchman borne, that knoweth the tenets of that Church better than strangers, that would abuse the example of the French to their owne ends; And I am assured in my conscience, that when I was adopted by the Church of England, I was not removed into another Gospel."²⁶ He then adds, with a bit of unconscious irony:

This also I may affirme of mine owne knowledge, that the French Divines and other godly men that travell into England, returne home with great satisfaction, seeing the soundnesse of doctrine and decency of order so well matched together; and joyne their hearty praises with the Te Deum and Magnificat of our Quires; praising God chiefly, because they see the puritie of the Gospel, and the Royall Authority linked together with a most neere interest in their mutuall conservation.²⁷

Du Moulin then reduces the Scottish claims of conformity to three headings--doctrine, discipline, and actions. The French, he stipulates, "will heartily embrace a Christian conformity with you, so farre as you shall not draw their necessitie into counsell, nor their faults into example."²⁸ Blessing God for the Reformed Churches' unity of doctrine, wherein "there is neither deformity nor differmity," Du Moulin avers that "of that faith the Kings Majestie is Defender, of which he hath lately published many solemne protestations, to the great satisfaction of all good Christians, both within and without the Kingdome."²⁹ Since the Bishops' Wars occasioned the debate, Du Moulin concentrates on the issue of Episcopacy, about which his father had written so much:

For whereas in one of your Petitions to his Majestie you are confident, that your neighbour-Churches will approve all your proceedings; your neighbour-Churches of France have solemnly disapproved all your proceedings, and herein given good satisfaction to his Majestie: For it was farre from our wishes, that your conformitie with the reformed Churches of France should be mis-applied as a pretence of your expulsing of your Bishops, much lesse a president for you to take armes against your gracious Sovereigne.³⁰

"A main point of difference pretended by the Covenanters," Du Moulin continues, "is the superioritie of Bishops (for I will not search into your other ames) which you affirme to be Antichristian, and contrarie to the Word of God; wherein I see not how you can claime conformitie with the French Churches. The French indeed have no Bishops, but they never put downe Bishops, nor induced others to put downe Bishops"³¹ Moreover, adds Du Moulin, "it was Necessity, not any Theologicall decision, that made them frame a Church without Bishops."³² It is therefore not the use, but the abuse, of Bishops to which the French Reformed object; and, he claims hopefully, "They onely crave the reformation of Religion, and are ready to submit themselves to Episcopall power."³³

But what about those other persistent cavils of the Puritans, the sign of the Cross in Holy Baptism and the wearing of the surplice? "The French Protestants," Du Moulin smugly notes, "keepe their seale of religion for higher matters, than a Surplice or a Crosse in Baptisme; and wonder much, that for such small things, you would parallell them [the Anglicans] with Antichrist, that maintaine the same holy Faith with you."³⁴ No need to quibble about such trifles, he adds, for the benevolence of King Charles has removed the thorn. In thus chiding the Scots, Du Moulin outlines his concept of Christian liberty:

But if those ceremonies be a yoke upon your consciences, the yoke is removed; and his Majesty is graciously pleased not to urge them upon you; which would never have bin granted, if the King and his Councell had thought them to be in their nature necessary, and binding the conscience. And though the Episcopall order (which the King will have you to receive) were a yoke upon your consciences; Thinke on the other side, that rebelling against your Sovereign, is a staine upon your consciences; And you are no good Divines, if you choose rather a foule staine than a light yoke. Neither doe you consider, that you may suffer a wrong in your Christian liberty, without wronging your conscience For spirituall liberty lieth not in the outward act, but in the intention and beliefe But if the thing be indifferent in it selfe, and yet seeme in the judgement inconvenient, we may and must do it, and neither wrong our libertie, nor our conscience; for in such cases our actions are limited, though our consciences be free, and the superiour power may bind us in foro exteriori, and leave us free in foro interiori, wherein Christian libertie lieth.³⁵ of ideas, it does have several points of interest. It shows a fairly complete assimilation of Du Moulin into English life and Anglican thought, as well as the staunch Royalism which runs through his later work. And if French Protestants were less hungry for Episcopacy than Du Moulin implied, we find him here first assuming the part of an interpreter between England and the Continent. He shows already the same aplomb in the role that marks his attack on Milton and the Puritans in 1652 with the publication of Clamor ad Coelum to assist Salmasius. Furthermore, his style already shows the qualities which, more fully developed, elevate his later English prose to the level of artistry--clarity, brevity, graciousness, and a sense of just proportion.

Although the Letter of a French Protestant shows little novelty

After the publication of the Letter of a French Protestant, Du Moulin led a life as a private citizen during the hectic decade of 1640-1650, that often included wandering and danger. As the Puritans, by attacking Episcopacy, struck at the political authority of the Crown and buttressed that of Parliament, and broke away the prelatical control which had confined their fervent energies, other figures moved more prominently than he through the successive acts of the national drama which climaxed in that memorable scene of the Martyr King on the scaffold. Among these were John Milton and Lewis Du Moulin, Non-conformist younger brother of Dr. Peter Du Moulin.

While we are not attempting to retell the tragedy and romance of the English Civil War, or advances or retreats of gallant Cavaliers and sternly disciplined Roundheads, or to hear the Puritan saints heralding the New Jerusalem, we should consider some of the issues which agitated England and the events they produced. One such issue was the quarrel over prelacy. In an age when for Protestants the Church had to re-orient its form and beliefs, and to re-define, as it was related to the state, the form it should take, the question of church structure was fundamental. Certainly the issue was both complicated and intensified by the great problem of Authority, Reason, and Scriptural interpretation--which we still have with us. Tiresome are the long tracts of theologians who solemnly club quotations to prove or disprove that the Holy Spirit inspired Episcopacy; and the protests by stump preachers that Popery and Antichrist were being smuggled into the Established Church are unpleasantly fanatic. Whereas at the start of the century Episcopacy had been a matter of leisurely correspondence between Bishop Andrewes and the elder Du Moulin, it now concerned all strata of English society and was a matter no longer academic.

The Bishops' Wars released the pent-up resentment and energies of the Puritans which, through the Courts of Star Chamber and High Commission, had been checked by the ecclesiastical arm of the government. Drained of funds, King Charles had to summon the Long Parliament of 1640, and the military backing which the Scottish army could supply English Presbyterians further enabled them to effect what they had only wished before. Against the background of what the militantly Puritan Long Parliament might do, the quarrel over Episcopacy erupted in an angry cross-fire of books and pamphlets. The Bishops' Wars started after the defiant General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, meeting at Glasgow from November 1 to December 20, 1638, eradicated remnants of episcopacy from the Kirk, tightened up its presbyterian organization, and condemned the service book. Compelled to try chastisement, Charles I mustered his sorry forces and sent them toward the Border, and also sought to justify his action against the Scots by issuing in 1639 A Large Declaration Concerning the Late Tumults in Scotland. Quite as if sweet reason could prevail, when the Scots had been aroused in an Assembly led by such a man as Alexander Henderson, Bishop Joseph Hall of Norwich wrote Episcopacie by Divine Right (1640). Developing the theory of Apostolical institution outlined earlier by Bishop Andrewes, Hall apparently thought it irrefutable and therefore final. He seemed hardly aware of the growth of Puritan economic power as a challenge to the old order, and did not understand how dangerously far private judgment had become a popular habit, especially in Scriptural interpretation, which undermined the foundation of hierarchy in Church and State.³⁶ While Hall's treatise, with the encouragement of Laud, was being advanced to uphold tradition in Scotland, the Scotch leader Robert Baillie, with the approval of the General Assembly, tried to step up the godly work of further Reformation in England. This was the Presbyterian intention of his Ladensium . . . the Canterburians Self-Conviction (April, 1640).³⁷

The Long Parliament soon made it clear how effective Presbyterian propaganda emanating from Scotland had been in England. As the demands of pulpit and pamphlet for a Presbyterian reformation of the English Church were echoed alarmingly in Parliament, Bishop Hall published his Humble Remonstrance to the High Court of Parliament (January, 1641), which briefly repeated the arguments from Episcopacie by Divine Right.³⁸ This brought Puritan replies, among which was a long pamphlet An Answer to a Booke Entituled, An Humble Remonstrance (ca. 20 March 1641), the work of five Presbyterian ministers including Thomas Young, John Milton's old tutor.³⁹ To this, Bishop Hall replied with A Defense of the Humble Remonstrance, against the Frivolous . . . Exceptions of Smectymnuus, his "most compelling synthesis of Episcopal dogma."⁴⁰ The Smectymnuans replied, and by late May or early June, John Milton had entered the paper war with Of Reformation in England, and the Causes that hitherto have hindered it. With this work, the promising young poet threw himself into the surge of public events, and began the long sequence of controversial works which ended nineteen years later with A Ready and Easy Way to establish a Free Commonwealth (1660). This series, the three Defenses and associated works will be considered later; and having been extensively treated by scholars, the other works do not call for discussion here.⁴¹

Standing beside Milton in the firing line of Puritans against the Crown and Established Church is Lewis Du Moulin, Doctor of Physick. Already a religious enthusiast in 1641, he had not as yet passed through the embittering experiences which later made him a bizarre figure, and, at the last, pathetic.⁴² While his Anglican brother Dr. Peter Du Moulin was moving to Yorkshire to take over the parish at Wheldrake,⁴³ Lewis Du Moulin was absorbed by the excitement sweeping England, and particularly the capital, over the prospect of a Presbyterian reform of the Established Church. For some, Presbyterianism may have been welcome because it seemed what the Bible required; but for most Puritans, it probably stood for successful resistance against tyranny. That the people had created the magistrates and therefore could rebel against oppressive rulers was comfortable doctrine to a group smarting under absolute government. This theory Presbyterianism had made fact in Scotland, and in so doing had become a cohesive national force. The fact that, because of differing situations, it could only have strangled the exfoliating genius of English Puritanism under the direction of parish popes was not clearly seen.⁴⁴ Du Moulin's orientation in the struggle appears to have been primarily religious, with political considerations second.

During the crowded year 1641, Lewis Du Moulin took time away from his profession of curing bodies to seek a cure for the nation's spiritual ailments. To spread Puritan truth abroad, he wrote a Latin account of the Bishops' Wars. He also joined his confrere John Milton in refuting Bishop Hall's claims of divine right for Episcopacy--again in Latin works designed for consumption abroad. And he drafted a petition to Parliament, which is probably the most interesting of the documents.

The account of the Bishops' Wars--Rerum Nuper in Regno Scotiae Gestarum Historia--was written under the pseudonym of Irenaeus Philalethes, and was designed to make a Puritan version of the wars available to an international audience. Without chapter headings, the text of the book runs 576 pages, and is supplemented by a six-page letter from the Scotch to the Swiss Churches tracing the struggles up to April, 1640. The copious detail of the book is illustrated with supporting documents.⁴⁵ And though there appears no distinct personal animus, Lewis Du Moulin went on counterming Royalist propaganda such as his brother's Letter of a French Protestant with his own Irenaei Philadelphi Epistola, ad Renatum Veridacum. In qua Aperitur Mysterium Iniquitatis novissimè in Anglia redivivum, & excutitur liber Iosephi Halli, quo asseritur Episcopatum esse juris divini . . . (Basle, 1641).⁴⁶

This refutation of Bishop Hall's theory was addressed to Lewis Du Moulin's uncle by marriage, the celebrated Andreas Rivetus; and yet Du Moulin partly robbed the book of effect by using an anagram of Rivetus' name on the title page. Rivetus (1573-1651) was a man whose support was worth something. In 1621 he had gone to England to wed Marie Du Moulin, sister of Pierre Du Moulin, and had been honored by Oxford. Later taking up residence in Holland, he had been made governor of Prince William by the Stadtholder Frederick Henry. It was Rivetus who negotiated Prince William's marriage to the Princess Henrietta Mary, daughter of King Charles I.⁴⁷ Therefore, in urging the Puritan view of Episcopacy and the disturbances in England, Du Moulin shows some moderation. He is not necessarily opposed to bishops when they are created for utility and good order, and suggests a compromise between Presbyterianism and Episcopacy by favoring a bishop as a spokesman and permanent presiding officer whose power is limited by an assembly which confers it. He disagrees with Andrewes that there cannot be a true church without bishops,⁴⁸ and observes that if Bishop Hall's divine right theory is correct, salvation is doubtful under the polity of the Reformed churches.⁴⁹

That Lewis Du Moulin's orientation was sincerely religious can be seen when he approaches the relationship of Crown and Church, by now so much identified that an attack on one involved the other. Although Du Moulin denies that Kings by divine right are the only legitimate administration for a commonwealth, he wishes to detract nothing from their sacred person and majesty. He would, however, unmask the ruse of the Bishops, who protect their own interests by paralleling monarchical and church government, and have so confounded church and state that when the Hierarchy is attacked the crown is also.⁵⁰ He denounces Archbishop Laud, and speaks respectfully of Bishop Hall.⁵¹ If Peter Du Moulin in his Letter of a French Protestant had considered rites and rubrics too trifling for the Scots to rebel at, Lewis Du Moulin found them too frivolous for the Bishops to insist upon.⁵² And, of course, he includes the usual charge that the bishops abuse their office because of avarice, ambition, and luxury, and that the lesser clergy follow their example.⁵³

Some of Lewis Du Moulin's characteristic thought in this decade is contained in a pamphlet he drafted in 1641 under his pseudonym Irenaeus Philadelphus. The eleven-page work is entitled Vox Populi, Expressed in XXIV. Motions to This Present Parliament. Being the generall voyce and the humble and earnest request of the people of God in England to that Most Honorable and Religious Assembly. For reforming the present corrupt State of the Church . . . Printed in the yeere, 1641. At a popular level, the work sets out, in Du Moulin's occasionally confused prose, how he would merge Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, reform the Episcopate, set up a kind of thought control, and bring the English Church into the strongest possible union with foreign Reformed Churches. Since the pamphlet, especially on this last point, must have represented the view of many, it is worth examining. To work out a revised form of church government, Lewis Du Moulin proposed an assembly of forty or fifty English divines who would not favor the High Church party, ten Scots divines, and eight "Forrain Divines of the most learned and famous; such as Rivetus, Primrose, Diodati, Moulin, and the like"⁵⁴ The form of polity they might devise would come up for Parliamentary approval.⁵⁵ Because the Reformed Churches had no quarrels over rituals, the new church discipline should "be approaching unto theirs, yet a sensible difference kept betweene theirs and ours."⁵⁶ As the next step, Du Moulin argued, a national synod should be called to frame a confession of faith, "to which may be called a competent number of Forraine Divines."⁵⁷ The Laudian divines who had rent the garment of faith should be chastised, Du Moulin acidly remarked:

However, since so many have beene so earnest of late, to be in charity with the Roman Church, that they have beene uncharitable to the Reformed Churches: Let Canons be made in the Synode, and an Act of Parliament for union with other Protestant Churches in matter of Doctrine: and all the fire-brands of these late innovations in the Church, that have made us a laughing stocke to the neighbour Churches, be sharrply censured, if not cut off as banes of the Church⁵⁸

To remedy "the principall defect of our Discipline, and the spring of all errorrs in Doctrine and Practice, which is the want of Synods," Du Moulin would have imported the system of the French Reformed Church.⁵⁹ He urged a "Nationall or Metropolitall Synod, which for the publike Union, is to bee kept once every two years,"⁶⁰ and to implement this demanded that "there be provincially Synods convoked in each Diocesse once a yeare; and that every moneth there bee a meeting of ministers within the Precinct of sixe or seven neighbour parishes through the whole Diocesse"⁶¹ While thus merging synodical government and the English diocesan arrangement, Lewis Du Moulin suggested a reformed episcopate. If retained, bishops would become ordinary ministers serving as permanent diocesan administrators. Moreover, they would "be enjoyned to preach diligently, as is the duty of their place and office."⁶² The bishops' visitations would be synods,⁶³ and the bishops would be censurable by either provincial or national synods, losing their episcopal power to impose, by canon law, rigorous penalties upon the clergy.⁶⁴ Only spiritual censures ought to be passed on the clergy by the church; fining and imprisonment should be returned to the civil magistrate.⁶⁵ The clergy of a diocese should choose its own bishop or present two candidates to the King, and each parish, in its turn, may "have the presentation of as many Ministers, as the flocks requireth" to the synod or bishop.⁶⁶ Lastly, all intermediate grades of the clergy--ranging from Dean and Archdeacon to the humble reader--should be swept away.⁶⁷

To avert the unholy lure of Babylon, the possibility of dangerous thought should be controlled at the source--specifically, as Lewis Du Moulin urged, "That the Fountains of Learning, Cambridge and Oxford, be purged from superstitious Rites and Popish doctrines, and Orthodox Readers be provided." Furthermore, public University readers should be squarely under control of the proposed national Synod.⁶⁸

Hardly imposing in size, Vox Populi still expressed many of the principal ideas which appear in Lewis Du Moulin's works for the next several years. The book was produced by a Nonconformist who sincerely wished, by compromise and eclecticism, to avoid civil disturbance and needless bloodshed.

But while Dr. Du Moulin was thus devising salve for the nation's sores, great events were agitating the country. The year saw debate over the "Root and Branch" Petition; the beginning of Strafford's trial on March 23, and the great Earl's execution on May 12, as buds came out on the trees. Following the Irish Rebellion (October 23), the Grand Remonstrance was presented on November 23, demanding that Charles I reform the Church and protect civil rights. The new year 1642 brought still worse news. After the attempted impeachment of the Five Members (January 3), King Charles illegally invaded the House of Commons (January 4), and in the hubbub that followed, fled London on January 10. When armed conflict could no longer be avoided, the King raised the royal standard at Nottingham on August 22, and the Battle of Edgehill was fought on October 23, with indecisive results and the Puritan Earl of Essex's retreat toward London afterwards. During the year 1643, futile negotiations were conducted by King Charles and commissioners from Parliament from February to April at Oxford. Milton's Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce appeared in August, and on September 25 Parliament entered into an alliance with Scotland by means of the Solemn League and Covenant.

There is little record of Dr. Peter Du Moulin's movements during this period of feverish activity, but his Puritan brother was busy bringing out two more works. Lewis Du Moulin, now writing under the pseudonym of Christianus Alethocritus, renewed the plea made in Vox Populi for a compromise solution to the problem of reforming the church, even at this late hour. This appeared first in his Latin tract Consilium de Reformanda Ecclesia Anglicana a Christiano Alethocrito Suggestum Amplissimo Coetui, autoritate augustissimi Consensus Regis & Regni Ordinum, indicto, ad consultandum de rebus gravissimis in Religione (London, 1643). As had Vox Populi, this book urged a large assembly to settle problems of church and state, and practically repeated the earlier work. Du Moulin hoped that the proposed assembly would not abrogate but amend the Episcopate; that Bishops would be colleagues, not masters of Presbyters; that they would do more preaching, and act primarily as spokesmen for their own "synedrums."⁶⁹ Frequent synods and a national synod every third year were urged.⁷⁰ While seeking essential parity of the clergy, Du Moulin would have retained bishops as permanent presiding officers.⁷¹ The second work which he published in 1643 was AYTOMAXIA: Or, The Selfe-Contradiction of Some that contend about Church-Government, Dialogus-wise digested into a Scholasticall Discourse, between Religion, Reason, Prejudice and Partiality . . . by Irenaeus Philalethes . . . (London, 1643).

Indeed, AYTOMAXIA is a curious work. It is nominally a conversation between four abstractions--Reason, Religion, Prejudice, and Partiality. Strolling along, Reason and Religion spy those trouble-makers Prejudice and Partiality walking ahead of them, and overtake them to start up conversation. The latest news is that "the London Petition, and the Ministers generall Petition, and their Remonstrance are Committeed, and that onely the point of Episcopacy is reserved to the Houses."⁷² And from here the book hobbles along. Du Moulin's explanation for the troubles of the time is that some persons "to maintaine their owne interests, give entertainment unto two dangerous Dames, whose perpetuall practice is to screw themselves into acquaintance with those whom they find most forward in troublesome times, to take a side and make a partie"⁷³ The "dangerous Dames" are, of course, Prejudice and Partiality. But Reason and Religion soon find they are really at one in belief, though apparently separated by "divers counterfeit wanderers abroad . . . bold to assume our names unto themselves"⁷⁴ At first clear-cut if wooden, the prose of AYTOMAXIA soon breaks down into an exchange of sermons written in a sometimes incoherent prose which may have baffled even the godly seeking edification. Reason makes twelve criticisms of financial inequalities of the clergy, abuses of church revenues, and excessive arbitrary power of Church officers.⁷⁵ As for the great problem of settling a church government, the book suggests that a form drawn out of both episcopal and presbyterian government, with the virtues of both, might do.⁷⁶

And so, as Lewis Du Moulin repeated his proposals in the hope they might help end the strife, 1643 ended, with Pym dying in December. The year 1644, destined to importance in English civil and literary history, opened with the invasion by the Scots to assist their Puritan brethren. It was the year of Milton's treatise Of Education (June 5), his tract The Judgment of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce (July 15), and finally the classic plea for freedom of the press, Areopagitica (November 24). As spring moved into summer, the Siege of York (May-June) was followed by the disastrous Battle of Marston Moor, where Fairfax, Cromwell, and Scotch forces under Leslie crushed the Royalists. The year ended with Cromwell's personal attack upon Manchester in Parliament, the Self-Denying Ordinance, and progress toward the strong New Model army.

As the tide of battle flowed into Yorkshire, Dr. Peter Du Moulin left his rectory at Wheldrake for the cathedral city of York. Though a man of peace, he had become an English patriot, and even while the Puritan cannon thundered around the ancient city, he was risking his life under fire to write another book which he hoped would help discredit the Rebel cause and serve his King. The intent of the book was the same as that of the Letter of a French Protestant, though done on a broader scale for a Continental audience--to undermine Puritan propaganda abroad. Quite apart from the danger in which it was written, the book itself has an interesting history of publication. Better than any paraphrase, Du Moulin's own account captures the excitement of the times in which it was written:

Our gracious king and now glorious martyr Charles the First, finding that his rebellious subjects, not content to make warre against him in his kingdom, assaulted him with another warre out of his kingdom with their tongues and pens; he set out a declaration to invite all his loving subjects and friends that could use the tongues of the neighboring states, to represent with their pens the justice of his cause, especially to Protestant churches abroad. That declaration smote my heart, as particularly addrest unto me; and I took it as a command layd upon me by God himself. Whereupon I made a solemn vow to God, that as farre as Latin and French could goe in the world, I would make the justice of the king's and the church's cause to be known, especially to the Protestants of France and the Low Countries, whom the king's enemies did chiefly labour to seduce and misinforme.

To pay my vow, I first made this booke, which was begun at York during the siege, in a roome whose chimney was beaten down by the canon while I was at my work; and after the siege, and my expulsion from my rectory at Wheldrake, it was finisht in an underground cellar, where I lay hid to avoid warrants that were out against me from committees to apprehend me and carry me prisoner to Hull.

Having finisht the book, I sent it to be printed in Holland, by the means of an officer of the master of the postes at London, Mr. Pompeo Calandrini, who was doing great and good services to the King in that place. But the king being dead, and the face of publique businesses altered, I sent for my manuscript out of Holland, and reformed it for the new king's service. And it was printed, but very negligently, by Samuel Browne, at the Haghe.

The title of the book was then as I have set it downe in a page by itself. Much about the same time I set out my Latin poeme Ecclesiae Gemitus, with a long epistle to all Christians, in the defense of the king and the church of England: and two years after, Clamor Regii sanguinis ad coelum.⁷⁷

Dr. Peter Du Moulin's French book was originally entitled Apologie de la Religion Reformée, et de la Monarchie et de l'Eglise d'Angleterre, contre les Calomnies de la Ligue rebelle de quelques Anglois et Escossois (The Hague: Samuel Browne, 1650). The book was later re-titled Histoire des Nouveaux Presbyteriens Anglois et Escossois, reaching a second French edition in 1660 after its English translation in 1659 by Matthew Playford.⁷⁸ Coming as it did after the horrifying execution of Charles I, the History of the English and Scotch Presbyterians was capable of far greater effect than in its first form.

Du Moulin managed to escape from the siege of York unharmed, perhaps returning for a time to Wheldrake to work on his book and to minister to his parishioners as best he could. The next year, 1645, was a disastrous year for the Royalists, opening on January 10 with the execution of old Archbishop Laud. On June 14, the King's military power disappeared when Fairfax and Cromwell won the field at Naseby. The plight of Charles became hopeless when attempts by Montrose to bring Scotland around to the King, and by Glamorgan to obtain Irish support, both failed. Milton (March 4) published two more divorce tracts, Tetrachordon and Colasterion, and Lewis Du Moulin published a piece of hack-work Latin translation, the Declaratio Regnorum Angliae et Scotiae Foedere & Armis junctorum pro vindicanda communi causa . . . adversus sceleratam factionem Episco-papisticam.⁷⁹ During 1646 the King's plight grew worse. On May 5 he became the voluntary prisoner of the Scots, and Oxford fell on June 20. Furthermore, the King lost the respect of both the Scots and English by his slippery tactics in negotiating the propositions of Newcastle. Full of godly zeal, the Presbyterian leadership of Parliament moved on with the work of reformation. The Prayerbook was proscribed, and more than 2000 Anglican clergymen were expelled from their livings. Among them was Peter Du Moulin, sequestered by the Westminster Assembly.⁸⁰ And having suppressed the Prayerbook, the Puritans further enlarged the wound by penalising the Cavaliers, for helping the King, with huge fines levied on their estates. But the Presbyterians then foolishly undermined themselves by turning on the Independents, who were the backbone of the Puritan army. Jealous of the New Model soldiers, and bitter because the Self-Denying Ordinance had cut short their own military careers, the Presbyterian leaders assumed the role of the friends of order. They tried to win the King, Cavaliers, and most conservative citizens by persecuting the sects.⁸¹ The Scots, to whom Charles had fled, had sold their King back to the English for the money due them, and the royal prisoner was now being held by Parliament at Holmby in Northhamptonshire. The Parliament leaders now plotted an alliance with the King against the Independent chiefs in the New Model Army. The Houses of Parliament first ordered (27 May 1647) the New Model to disband without its arrears of pay. Then, having drawn up a Presbyterian government for a national church, they decided on a system of thought control comparable to the rigor of Geneva or the Synod of Dort. In September, 1646, a bill had been read in Commons by which Unitarians and free-thinking heretics could be put to death, and Baptists and other sectaries imprisoned for life because of their religious opinions;⁸² now persecution of the sects was to begin. In the familiar pattern of the Reformed churches abroad, as exemplified in the Dort canons and the French version of them adopted at the Synod of Alais, any creative thought was to be eliminated. As Trevelyan remarks, "A prospect of intolerable dreariness was opening for the speculative and religious life of England."⁸³ Milton, who had so warmly urged the Presbyterian system, angrily declared in his sonnet "On the new forcers of Conscience" that

"New Presbyter is but Old Priest writ Large."

The New Model, however, did not disband, but gradually approached and finally occupied London (6 August 1647). After eleven Parliament leaders were expelled, the Presbyterian majority was permitted--on sufferance--to return to power, and the Army retired. But the split was complete. The Independents had converted the Army, and it was now the seedbed of democratic opinions.⁸⁴ Opinion in the ranks was dominated from 1647 to 1649 by Lilburne and the Political Levellers, who stood for republicanism, universal suffrage, and religious toleration. Afraid of the possibly anarchistic results of these ideas in a society not yet ready for them, Cromwell and Ireton withstood a proposed democratic constitution, embodying these principles, put forward by the elected Agents of the Army in debates at Putney (October-November, 1647). Making a last desperate try at preserving the traditional power of the Crown under the new conditions, Cromwell and Ireton negotiated with Charles from July into September. The treaty offered Charles, called the Heads of the Proposals, was almost the settlement of 1689, and embodied more than the King could have hoped for.⁸⁵ But the King had only toyed with the stern Puritan generals, and on November 15 fled from Hampton Court to Carisbrooke Castle on the Isle of Wight. There, "he spent the winter and spring in summoning Scots, Presbyterians, and Royalists to rise and destroy the sects."⁸⁶

The King's call was answered, and the Second Civil War went on from May into August, 1648. Permitting only the rallying cry "God Save the King," it fused the permanent Royalist alignment of Presbyterians with the Anglican and Catholic aristocracy. But Royalist hopes came to an end at the terrible battle of Preston fought August 17-19. Parliamentary leaders again negotiated with the King at Carisbrooke (September, 1648); but returning Army men would have no treaty, and Colonel Pride purged Parliament (December 6) of Presbyterians favorable to the King. All that was left, the Rump Parliament of less than one hundred men, declared Parliament the supreme power in the nation (4 January 1649) and erected a "High Court of Justice" to try the King for treason (January 6).⁸⁷ Begun on January 20, the King's trial ended with his sentencing to death on January 27. It was, historians agree, nothing more than a judicial murder and political folly. By the exclusion of any who might favor the King and thus give him a fair hearing, the results were predetermined. The brutality shown the King during his last imprisonment, even while at his prayers, made his execution a martyrdom in fact, and not a pose. With his handsome dignity and courtly mien, he became the very symbol of the Monarchy which during centuries had become part of the English soul. For it to be so rudely plucked away was more than the popular mind could bear; and the loud groan which the crowd around the scaffold uttered when the King's bleeding head was held up for inspection was also the prophetic death cry of Puritan attempts at government.

If it seems extravagant to call the King's execution political folly, subsequent events proved it had been so. We must recapture soon the surcharged political atmosphere which the deed created, but now it is necessary more briefly to see the framework within which Peter Du Moulin lived and wrote until the Restoration of 1660. The execution had effect at home and abroad. Domestically, the popular sympathy for the slain King was greatly enhanced by an appealing book which he was long believed to have written during his imprisonment. This was the Eikon Basilike, a pious and prayerful apologetic for his record of behavior with Parliament; it virtually completed the canonising of Charles the Martyr. Milton answered it with his Eikonoklastes. But the foreign impact of the King's death was also great, and it meant serious problems for whatever new government might rule England. There were the foreign marriage ties of the Stuarts. The English Queen, Henriette Marie, was the aunt of the French King, Louis XIV; the daughter of Charles I was married to the future Dutch Stadtholder, William II. Even allowing for some division of opinion in both France and Holland about the rights and wrongs of the English revolt, the diplomatic situation was precarious. But still worse, the execution of Charles I wrote a bloody exclamation-mark after the long continental debate over popular sovereignty and the right to try kings. As Jesuit theory was donning Puritan homespun, the most learned man of the times, Claude de Saumaise, restated the principal counter-theory, the Divine Right of Kings. This appeared, we will recall, in his Defensio Regia for Charles I, a work which received a sensational welcome from Europe and Scandinavia. Like the Eikon Basilike, it appeared in 1649, while excitement over the King's death was feverish. Nor did interest subside much, for the issues were continental as well as insular; and the angry debate which followed, in which Milton and Du Moulin appeared, kept it current. Therefore, now if ever, works were timely which would win support for either side.

During 1650, Peter Du Moulin was writing and projecting several works intended to demonstrate to Europe, and especially the French Reformed, that the Puritan Revolt and the execution were a conspiracy of sniveling hypocrites or rogues crazed by fanaticism. The violence with which he writes is to be expected of the seventeenth century, and the mounting turbulence of affairs in England, with the personal suffering involved, exacerbated what he had to say. The first of the works was the Apologie de la Religion Reformée, et de la Monarchie et de l'Eglise d'Angleterre which, as we have seen, was begun at the siege of York, completed while Du Moulin hid in an underground cellar, and was returned from Holland for necessary manuscript revisions before its first printing at The Hague in 1650. The second was his fulminatory Latin poem Ecclesiae Gemitus, which bitterly depicted the plight of the Anglican Church under the Puritan regime. This, according to Du Moulin, was first published at London the month after the King's execution.⁸⁸ The third book was his scorching attack on Milton, Cromwell, and the Regicides, the Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum adversus Parricidas Anglicanos (The Hague, 1652). The three works were anonymous; and prudently, for on 8 June 1649 the Council of State had considered an act "for settling £100 a year a-piece upon Peter du Molin, Mr. Hartlipp [Samuel Hartlib], Peter Sterry, Thomas Foxley, and Jno. Owen, read the first and second time, and committed to the members of the House that are of the Committee of Goldsmiths' Hall."⁸⁹ Since Ecclesiae Gemitus and Clamor ad Coelum will be treated later, we will here consider the Apologie, or, as it was later retitled, The History of the English and Scotch Presbytery.

The book attempted to nullify efforts by the Covenanters to persuade the French Reformed that their natural affinity and interests were with the Puritans. Taking a position of moderate episcopacy and the Divine Right of Kings, it recalled the view of Hooker and the elder Du Moulin that episcopacy, though desirable, is not essential to a valid church. It pleads that a liturgy, since it can vary and does not necessarily exclude free prayer by gifted clergymen, is desirable for seemliness and form. With particular emphasis, the History stresses that the Reformed Churches and the Establishment hold a common faith despite differences of forms and polity. These are the general contentions of the book. It also included a preface "to the Ministers of the Reformed Church at Paris";⁹⁰ and its supporting documentation comprised a manifesto by Charles I (in Latin, English, and French) that he did not intend to introduce Romish religion,⁹¹ and the Articles of Religion of the Church of England.⁹²

Because of the baleful attitude of the French Crown toward the Huguenots, it would have been unpolitic for them to sympathise with the English rebels who had just killed their King. Astutely making still more of this point in his later Clamor ad Coelum, Du Moulin here first bluntly presents it for their consideration:

Know then, Gentlemen, that your most holy Religion is much defamed by the Actions of these parasite Zealots, who have particularly courted and invited you to Covenant with them, and that your Churches are blemished in reputation, onely because these men have dared to addresse their infamous complements to you, a thing neverthelesse which ye could not prevent how great soever your aversion were from their wicked actions; wherefore we beseech you, as you love your subsistence and the honour of the Gospel, which ought to be the dearer to you then your lives, that you exhort the general of your Churches to declare readily and vigorously by a publick Act against these false brethren and their pernicious Maximes, for fear least the crime of men, be imputed to Religion, and that the innocent suffer not for the guilty. Let it appear to the State under which ye live, that the Reformed Religion for conscience sake upheld Kingly Authority, and that it is the true Doctrine that maintains subjects in their duty and a Kingdome in peace.⁹³

The matter of Episcopacy offered some difficulty. The subject was no longer one for pleasant speculation by corresponding divines; and Peter Du Moulin was in fact asking the French Protestants to stand by a church government which no longer legally existed in England, a church polity whose own leaders had done much to alienate the Huguenots. But was any such alienation really the work of Laud and his followers, or merely a misunderstanding created by conniving Puritans? Some misguided Anglicans may have contributed, Du Moulin admits:

In these great tryalls of our faith and patience, whilst we seek ease in pouring forth our griefs into the bosome of our brethren, behold yet another encrease of affliction; for we find to our great regret, that the subtilty of our enemies have begotten an evil understanding between you and some of ours, to which some have much contributed, if the complaints we heare be true, that they have manifested and declared themselves contrary to the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches, and that they have despised your assemblies, as not being Churches, and maintained that there could be no Church where there was no Bishop.⁹⁴

In fairness, Du Moulin had to concede such a position to be "full of rashnesse and void of Charity . . . indeed a cruel sentence to deprive of the benefit of the Gospel, and of their union with Christ, all those Churches which live under the crosse, and cannot enjoy the Episcopall Order."⁹⁵ To show that this was not representative of the Anglican teachings, he turned back to the revered Lancelot Andrewes and his correspondence with Pierre Du Moulin. "That Famous D^r Andrews Bishop of Winchester," he recalled, "was not of this opinion, for in one of his Epistles touching Episcopacy, He (saith he) should be harder then Iron, who would not acknowledge that there are holy Churches that subsist and flourish without Bishops; and with what respect our Bishops speak of your Church, you shall read in this ensuing Treatise."⁹⁶ Scripture enjoins good order, he points out, but "there is no entire Rule of Discipline layd down," and to seek it is "to search that in the Word of God, which is not there to be found."⁹⁷ Provided that the Bible is not contravened, it is left to ministers of the Word to fashion what church polity circumstances dictate.⁹⁸ "It's easie to see that the Episcopall Order is wholly incompatible with the present condition of the Reformed Churches of France," Du Moulin grants, "for if there were twenty or thirty Bishops amongst you, that should Govern all the other Churches, it would be easie for those of the contrary Religion under whom you live, to fill up those places with some persons who should be at their devotion; whence would follow, either a seduction, or an oppression of the other Pastors"⁹⁹

Du Moulin then advances the theory that church polity must be shaped according to the nature of the civil power, and angrily rejects the theocratic state as universally necessary. To parallel the Presbyterian equality of the clergy in the civil state will obviously subvert monarchical government:

Whosoever shall consider the Kingdoms and Commonwealths of Christendome, shall find that every where the Religion of the State hath a Discipline suitable to the Civil Government, the Church taking hold of the State, as the Ivie that groweth about a Tree: But the Covenanters pretend the quite contrary, labouring to Form the State to their new pattern of Ecclesiasticall Discipline. Hither tended the Petition of the Rabble of London, to the House of Commons; which was after by the same House in a Body, presented to the House of Lords; Wherein they required an equallity in the State, that thereby there might be one in the Church. An action which will leave for ever to Posterity, an infamous and true Character of the Intentions of the Covenanters: But in this they have but followed the Doctrine of their Sect. . . . Their designe is wholly void of all Prudence and possibility, and being ruinous to the State, must of necessitie be the ruine of it self.¹⁰⁰

Du Moulin's three books undoubtedly had some effect, which he felt was the result of Divine intention. "God blessed these books, and gave them the intended effect," he wrote some years later, "the disabusing of many misinformed persons. And it was so well resented by his majesty, then at Breda, that, being shewed my sister Mary among a great company of ladies, he brake the crowd to salute her, and tell her that he was very sensible of his obligations to her brother, and that if ever God settled him in his kingdom, he would make him know that he was a grateful Prince."¹⁰¹ And so it happened.

But the good fortune and recognition which awaited Du Moulin at the Restoration were still well in the future. During the Interregnum, he continued to move about and to write, safe so long as the anonymity of his three books, especially Clamor ad Coelum, was preserved. The year 1649 had seen publication of Milton's Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, upholding popular sovereignty and justifying the doctrine of tyrannicide as it might apply to the late Charles I. With the appearance of Milton's reply to Salmasius, the Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, in 1650 and then Du Moulin's Gloria ad Coelum in 1652, there opened up the literary cannonade which we shall treat separately. It is much easier to share the brilliant and cynical atmosphere of the Restoration with Du Moulin than it is to keep pace with him in the Fifties; but we can still follow his activities during the Interregnum with some certainty.

As a man of learning and an illustrious name, he attracted the patronage of Richard Boyle, the Earl of Cork.¹⁰² After the rebellious Irish had been reduced by the Parliament forces in 1650-52, Du Moulin lived there, sometimes at the Boyle family seat of Lismore, sometimes at Youghal where there was a Boyle residence, and at other times at Dublin.¹⁰³ During this time he was evidently serving as a tutor in the family;¹⁰⁴ and after the incorporation of his D.D. degree at Oxford on 10 October 1656,¹⁰⁵ he continued to serve there as tutor to Richard Boyle and to Charles Boyle, the Viscount Dungarvan.¹⁰⁶ It was through this connection that he formed the association with Robert Boyle, the "father of modern chemistry," which is a prominent feature of his life during the Restoration. Known as "an honest and zealous Calvinist," Du Moulin preached frequently at the church of St. Peter-in-the-East at Oxford, and served as vicar of Bradwell, Buckinghamshire, for a few days in October or November, 1657.¹⁰⁷ Also in 1657 he published the first edition of A Treatise of Peace and Contentment of minde (London, 1657), an unusually pleasant contemplative work which was to have a great vogue.¹⁰⁸

In contrast to this work of spiritual repose, Peter Du Moulin brought out the next year the first edition of another book, one which reflected both human credulity in the mid-seventeenth century and belonged to a curious literature of the Restoration. Du Moulin translated a gossip account by a French Reformed pastor, François Perreaud, of a visit made by a spirit to his house. The translation was made, as we shall see, at the request of Robert Boyle. After the highly successful crusade of 1645-47, in which the witchfinder Matthew Hopkins and his assistant John Stearne had sent several hundred victims to the gallows in a nation convulsed by war, both interest and prosecutions for alleged witchcraft dropped off in the more stable civil and judicial conditions of the 1650's.¹⁰⁹ Consequently, Du Moulin's book, entitled The Devil of Mascon, did not reflect the Puritan bigotry which helped the Hopkins campaign along, but rather looked forward to the philosophical witchcraft literature of the Restoration.¹¹⁰

While Dr. Peter Du Moulin was thus passing his time quietly until the Restoration should raise him to prominence, his brother Dr. Lewis Du Moulin was enjoying a time of prosperity before the King's return plunged him into the sad notoriety of his latter years and a pitiable death. He had become a licentiate of the London College of Physicians in 1640, and in 1648 was appointed Camden professor of ancient history at Oxford, succeeding the ejected Royalist Robert Waring.¹¹¹ The medical degree he had taken at Leyden (8 July 1627)¹¹² was incorporated at Cambridge on 10 October 1634, and at Oxford on 14 July 1649.¹¹³ His letter of denisation was recorded 28 June 1655,¹¹⁴ and a naturalisation bill was introduced 9 October 1656, finally passing Commons on 8 June 1657 and receiving Cromwell's assent the following day.¹¹⁵ Dr. Lewis Du Moulin was now a man of solid position and passable financial circumstances,¹¹⁶ whose assured place in the world it would take some change to overthrow.

But England was ready for such a change. The political forces of Puritanism, divisive as they were, had required a strong man to bind and direct them. Death had taken Cromwell on 3 September 1658; and unable to govern, his inept son Richard had abdicated. On 8 May 1660, the Convention Parliament voted for the restoration of Charles II, then at Breda in Holland. After long years of grim Puritan virtue, England wanted to be merry again--or at least amused. For this pastime, it had chosen the best man it could have found.

CHAPTER IV

OLD WITCHES AND NEW SCIENCE:

Du Moulin in the Restoration Milieu

Upon retiring on the eve of the Restoration, an optimistic Englishman might have felt that, like the swain of Milton's Lycidas, he would "Tomorrow to fresh Woods, and Pastures new." Certainly, when King Charles II landed, a new breeze blew in which swept away many old opinions. And while the history of the Restoration need not be re-written here, one does need to catch afresh the atmosphere in which Peter Du Moulin moved. It is the age of such diverse figures as John Milton, John Dryden, Meric Casaubon, Sir Thomas Browne, Joseph Glanvill, Descartes, Thomas Hobbes, Sir Isaac Newton, and Robert Boyle. It is also the age of the Cambridge Platonists and one in which old witches are the subject of serious philosophical writings. Of absorbing ideas and personalities, it offers God's plenty. At once a Calvinist, a Royalist, and an Anglican priest, Du Moulin is often a prominent figure in this mixed political, intellectual, and religious milieu.

Even though reform in speech to match new ideas was soon to be demanded, older ideas and modes of utterance persisted, however traditional diction might be given new applications. Scriptural allegory which the Puritan would have used for the progress of the wayfaring, warfaring Christian, John Dryden turned to brilliant political satire in Absalom and Achitophel (1681). When lampooning Slingsby Bethel, a sheriff of London, as Shimei, Dryden expressed the political corruption of the age (ll. 597-598):

During his office, treason was no crime;

The sons of Belial had a glorious time.

And yet one senses it is with this dubious moral climate that Dryden really sympathized. Darkly aloof amid the blazing noon of royal prosperity, Milton spoke of the courtly sons of Dagon and their glorious time with the iron bell-tone of the Puritan conscience in Samson Agonistes, his final summing-up. Indeed, Samson could not have been "doctrinal and exemplary" to the English nation, without the need for, and richness of, a really moral criticism of the time; its standard is that of intelligent Protestant humanism. Trying to buy his son's freedom from the (Philistine) lords (ll. 1457 ff.), Manoa, the father of Samson, finds some

Contemptuous, proud, set on revenge and spite;
That part most reverenc'd Dagon and his Priests,
Others more moderate seeming, but thir aim
Private reward, for which both God and State
They easily would set to sale

The wittiest document of this "Idolatrous rout amidst thir wine" is, of course, the sprightly comedy of the Restoration; but this properly belongs to dramatic history. And so, though Puritanism remained as part of the national morals, worldly advancement now awaited men who could perform a volte-face adroitly. Andrew Marvell, who had succeeded

Milton as Latin Secretary in the Protectorate, was dexterous enough in An Horatian Ode to praise both Cromwell and Charles I. In his Heroic Stanzas first published in 1659, Dryden could conclude that Cromwell's "name a great example stands, to show/ How strangely high endeavors may be blest,/ Where piety and valor jointly go."¹ The next year (1660), he could extol in Astrea Redux the returned Charles II in these terms:

O happy age! O times like those alone
 By fate reserv'd for great Augustus' throne!
 When the joint growth of arms and arts foreshew
 The world a monarch, and that monarch you.²

If one surveys the intellectual achievements of the Restoration, Dryden was to a degree prophetic. He was also testifying that, in this milieu of new clarity and old grotesquerie, of political equivocation and cerebral juggling, every alert man must be his own Janus.

This dualism touched the deepest things, such as the delicate relationship of faith and reason, nescience and knowledge, body and soul, rationalism and experimentation, determinism and free will. Cartesian dualism aside, the whole period seems almost to have been foreshadowed by the dichotomy imbedded in the logic of Peter Ramus--even to man and the cosmos. It was an age of flux and dissociation. Sir Thomas Browne wrote in Part II of Religio Medici (1643) that

I cannot think that Homer pin'd away upon the riddle of the fishermen; or that Aristotle, who understood the uncertainty of knowledge, and confessed so often the reason of man too weak for the works of nature, did ever drown himself upon the flux and reflux of Euripus. We do but learn to-day, what our better advanced judgements will unteach tomorrow; and Aristotle doth but instruct us, as Plato did him; that is, to confute himself. I have run through all sorts, yet find no rest in any: though our first studies and junior endeavours may style us Peripateticks, Stoicks, or Academicks, yet I perceive the wisest heads prove, at last, almost all Scepticks, and stand like Janus in the field of knowledge.³

The problem of man's knowledge and God's ways was painfully crystallized by the Restoration, and bequeathed to posterity without an answer. By traditional theology, Milton twice sought to dramatize the justice of God's ways to men, with the gorgeous canvas and homocentric cosmos of Paradise Lost, and with the austere concentration of Paradise Regained (1671); and he reaffirmed the providential order in the somber, muted magnificence of Samson Agonistes (1671). Here, even as the deterministic philosophy of Hobbes, the dualistic rationalism of Descartes, and the propaganda of the New Science were undermining the traditional foundations of faith, he stubbornly insisted that

Just are the ways of God,
And justifiable to Men;
Unless there be who think not God at all,
If any be, they walk obscure

Yet more there be who doubt his ways not just,
 As to his own edicts, found contradicting,
 Then give the rains to wandring thought,
 Regardless of his glories diminution;
 Till by thir own perplexities involv'd
 They ravel more, still less involv'd,
 But never find self-satisfying solution.⁴

Here, then, were stated the spiritual and intellectual cruxes of this Restoration which was external only. Exhausted by its civil convulsions, England could somewhat restore the old political order; to regain the old, easy confidence in the meaning of things was beyond its power. This is signalized by the irony that the year 1667 produced Bishop Sprat's glowing apology for the New Order, the History of the Royal Society, and Milton's last-stand defense of the Old, Paradise Lost. If spiritual comfort had ever been a paradise, it was indeed lost, for in 1668 appeared Joseph Glanvill's Plus Ultra, to advance the forces of the New Science and the problems that followed their camp. Now elevated to prominence, Peter Du Moulin, molded by the old if ever man was, had to find his bearings in the new order, among the great men who shaped it.

Though largely formed on the angular pattern of Calvinism, Du Moulin adjusted comfortably to the Restoration. The satisfaction with which he viewed the New Science and the Royal Society seems due partly to Calvinistic inclinations to natural research, and partly to a personal quality of Du Moulin--namely a Gallic prudence which made one's duties to God, to King, and to self coincide remarkably with good fortune. If, in general, there were two Restorations--the first, political and social in 1660, the second, religious in 1661⁵--church rewards still came early to those who had served well. Undoubtedly zealous, Du Moulin had not long to wait. Because of his effective works for the Royalist cause, he was made a prebendary of Canterbury Cathedral and a chaplain of Charles II. Whereas his connections with the Boyle family during the Interregnum were now to bring him into contact with the New Science, his appointment as a canon of Christ Church, Canterbury, put him on terms of familiarity with the leading dignitaries of the Church. The works which caused his promotion were, we will recall, the Apologie de la Religion Reformée, et de la Monarchie et de l'Eglise d'Angleterre, started during the bombardment of York and finished in hiding in a cellar; and the Regii Sanguinis Glamor ad Coelum, which had flayed Milton and the Puritan government of Cromwell. These books had come to the attention of Charles II, who made it a point, while still at Breda, to express his gratitude for them to Du Moulin's sister Mary.

The new King landed, amid wild applause, at Dover on 25 May 1660. He was soon beset with requests for preferment, and among the deserving was Du Moulin. Probably in May, 1660, Du Moulin asked for "the same spiritual estate which was bestowed on his father by King James, viz., a prebend in Canterbury, with the rectory of Llanrhaeadar, diocese Bangor."⁶ The petition was quickly acted upon, for on 29 June 1660

Du Moulin was presented as a canon in the fourth prebend, succeeding his father.⁷ As the Church slowly began to function, key appointments were made. Among these were several notable figures with whom Du Moulin had varying degrees of intimacy.

The inevitable choice as the new Archbishop of Canterbury was the aged William Juxon, who as Bishop of London had attended Charles I in his last hours on the scaffold, and to whom the dying King had entrusted his famous last command—"Remember! Remember!" Juxon was elevated to the archbishopric on 20 September 1660, and was consecrated in King Henry VII Chapel at Westminster.⁸ Restored as Dean of Canterbury was Thomas Turner, who had been appointed by Charles I in 1643, and was belatedly installed on 10 August 1660. Du Moulin was later to deliver the funeral sermon upon Dr. Turner's death in 1672.⁹ But his closest associate among the incoming or returning clergy was Meric Casaubon, who had been presented as a canon in the ninth prebend on 19 June 1628,¹⁰ and was now sixty-one years old. Even if differences about Scriptural interpretation and the mysteries of religion had caused a rift between their fathers Isaac Casaubon and Pierre Du Moulin a half-century before, the sons now were staunch friends despite opposed views about the New Science.

At the very center of English religious activity and conservatism at Canterbury, both Peter Du Moulin and Meric Casaubon were necessarily involved in the spiritual and intellectual conflicts following the Civil Wars. In the earlier quarrel of Isaac Casaubon and Pierre Du Moulin there is, for all their heavily orthodox piety, a foretaste of the broader and more enlivening struggle for men's minds which swirled around the New Science. However admirable from a standpoint of historicity, the great Casaubon's worship of Christian Antiquity--the Fathers--still faced backward. Antiquity was the touchstone for all. And if the severely Calvinistic Du Moulin gazed back wistfully to the vision of a pristine Church, yet his belief that Scripture alone provides formulae which unaided human reason can decipher was part of the rebellion against Antiquity and Authority which marked the Reformation and subsequent secular thought. The disagreement of Casaubon and Du Moulin thus looks forward to the greater quarrel of Ancients vs Moderns, which, when full-blown, informs the controversies about the New Science. The attitudes of the elder Du Moulin and Casaubon in a quarrel over a religious view hinted at the positions their sons would take concerning the broader question on a quasi-secular plane. In the field of philosophy, Meric Casaubon stood firmly by Aristotle and Antiquity. With Peter Du Moulin, however, Antiquity was not a great consideration. His thinking showed, very often in an attractive way, Calvinism's receptivity to natural knowledge, if taken as an additional testimony to God's glory. All considered, his view is pragmatic, religious, and progressive.

The many studies, still being augmented, of the evolution of modern thought in the seventeenth century make such a task unnecessary here.¹¹ To review the intellectual trends of the Restoration, however, helps us to define Peter Du Moulin's place in this milieu. Some attitudes, religious and secular, are overtly a rebellion against the authority of Antiquity, particularly the philosophy of the purpose, method, and confines of scientific reasoning as found in the doctrine of the medieval Schoolmen. Here we may place Calvinism, the experimental science proclaimed by Sir Francis Bacon, and the mechanistic philosophy of Descartes. On the other hand, still other reactions against scholasticism dethroned Aristotle and Aquinas only to borrow other authorities from antiquity for a fruitful modern development. Of such, we may name the philosophical skepticism stemming from Pyrrho of Elis and Sextus Empiricus to Sir Thomas Browne, and the atomistic, materialistic determinism coming from Epicurus to the terrible Thomas Hobbes. When these forces, Calvinism excepted, converged upon the Aristotelian logic and philosophy still intrenched in the Universities, the defenders of tradition shouted "Atheism!" in alarm. What they meant was that these bogeymen would not only dismantle the old order, but also would leave along with the wreckage a world, a universe, void of imaginative richness, warmth, or meaning. On the other side, the champions of the New Science, as their ideas blended or coalesced, enthusiastically promised unheard-of material progress through the mastery of nature to the glory of God. To hold things together, the peacemakers in distress tried to soften the war cries by professing a nominal respect for antique philosophy, and the argument that the awful inscrutability of God's ways was a good reason for searching the Book of Nature instead.

Calvin himself had blessed the investigation of Nature's operations, provided that it redounded to God's glory and that the scientist did not ungratefully substitute Nature for God as the architect of the universe.¹² With an eye upon the danger of forbidden knowledge, he observed that it is better "not to attempt with presumptuous curiosity to pry into his essence, which is rather to be adored than minutely discussed, but to contemplate him in his works, by which he draws near, becomes familiar, and in a manner communicates himself to us"¹³ Rightly used, more knowledge brings "deeper insight into the workings of divine wisdom,"¹⁴ he held, and from the very incompleteness of the evidence yielded, one may infer a fuller manifestation in another life.¹⁵ The dominant view of Elizabethan England was that natural science came from, and must return to, God; and that science must not be divorced from its religious frame of reference. If it were, neglect of the spiritual realm under God would lead through materialism to atheism, "the final horror."¹⁶ But there was a basic opposition between the Providential yearnings of religion and the cold requirements of natural science, which pointed an ominous finger toward the seventeenth century:

As against science's optimum demand for an exact natural order, religion wanted a completely providential order, one which was directed by the Almighty to man's moral schooling, and ultimate salvation On the other hand, the idea of a divine plan was in no way useful or necessary to science. And of course the fewer miracles the better.¹⁷ progress possible through a new gospel of method, and held out as goals the advancement of learning and piety. This was to be achieved by sweeping away the finely spun cobwebs of scholastic reasoning, a method which, applied to the material universe, was barren of works. The ancient authors, whose scientific theories, based on abstract reasoning only, were demonstrably wrong, also must go. He urged instead the direct observation of Nature and the experimental method, with productivity for human good as the criterion of value. On suspended judgment and the avoidance of overhasty generalisation hung the Law and the Prophets. Calling upon men to work slowly upward from a sensuous knowledge of Nature to abstract general truths, the learned Verulam held out constantly the incentive of greater material prosperity.¹⁸ Partly sanctified by Calvin, then, the doctrines of the learned Lord Chancellor had a twofold appeal for the Puritan--the rejection of the scholastic logic and ancient authority in which the theology of both Roman and Anglican churches was grounded, and a utilitarian purpose which beckoned fetchingly to the practical turn of Puritan minds. As a result, Baconian science began to flourish during the Interregnum, while Du Moulin was acting as a tutor in the Boyle family and translating The Divell of Maseon (1658). So noticeable was Puritan enthusiasm for practical science that it proved a measurable handicap in the Restoration. Other forces also were at work during the Interregnum which complicated later attempts to promote the New Science. After outcries of "Atheist," and "Epicure!" had already been heard against him, Thomas Hobbes in 1651 published his Leviathan, or the Matter, Forme & Power of a Common-Wealth Ecclesiasticall and Civill. Philosophical skepticism, familiar in England through Montaigne's Apology for Raymond Sebond and Samson Lennard's 1612 translation of the treatise Of Wisdome by Pierre Charron, was richly stated by Sir Thomas Browne in Religio Medici (1643).¹⁹

Sir Francis Bacon revealed to men a tantalizing vision of future

When these opposing forces collided over the founding and growth of the Royal Society in the sixties, Peter Du Moulin was caught in the middle. His friend Dr. Meric Casaubon became the ablest spokesman for conservatism, while Joseph Glanvill—whose ideas Du Moulin approved and pugnacity he deplored—was the champion of progressive ideas. Because of his sympathy for the New Science, Du Moulin even found publication of his own works held up.

Casaubon's antipathy to the New Science appears to have stemmed both from his political and his humanistic points of view. Before the Civil Wars, he had enjoyed the favor of Archbishop Laud and the personal interest of Charles I. The Puritan usurpation of power hurt him deeply, for not only were his patrons executed, but he lost his church preferments and had to live in retirement. Worst of all, his poverty forced him to sell most of his books.²⁰ Because of Casaubon's eminence as a scholar, however, Cromwell tried several times to persuade him to write a history of the Civil Wars, offering Casaubon the library of his father Isaac Casaubon as a partial reward.²¹ Despite Meric Casaubon's adamant refusal on grounds that the results would not please Cromwell, the Protector as a gracious gesture ordered that between £300 and £400 be placed in a bookseller's hands for him. This, too, Casaubon declined.²² Deciding to end his days in England, Casaubon refused an offer of Queen Christina to head a Swedish university.²³ A man whose temper was hardly irresolute, Casaubon took the field early against Puritanism. His attack was leveled against the evil angel of the Puritan soul, Enthusiasm. Depending on the point of view, those who wondered at these fits of ranting attributed them either to divine inspiration or diabolical possession. Even if his medical learning was Galenic, Casaubon took a shrewd approach: in A Treatise Concerning Enthusiasme, As It Is an Effect of Nature: but is mistaken by many for either Divine Inspiration, or Diabolical Possession (London, 1655), he showed that the prophets of the stump were only mental cases.²⁴ This shrewdness is worth noting, for if one is misled by Casaubon's antiquarian bias or strong language against materialistic philosophies, the value of his really penetrating critique of the New Science may suffer.

As a Royalist and humanist, Casaubon must have been further soured on Puritanism and experimental science by a work published the year before his Treatise Concerning Enthusiasme appeared. John Webster, a country doctor who was both a Puritan and a Baconian and later criticized Casaubon and Du Moulin in the witchcraft war, published a volume generously entitled Academiarum Examen, Or the Examination of Academies. Wherein is discussed and examined the Matter, Method and Customes of Academick and Scholastick Learning, and the insufficiency thereof discovered and laid open; As also some Expedients proposed for the Reforming of Schools, and the perfecting and promoting of all kind of Science. Offered to the judgements of all those that love the proficiencie of Arts and Sciences, and the advancement of Learning (London, 1654). After Webster had brandished his verbal club, little was left to be said about the Aristotelian university curriculum fostered by the Established Church:

This Philosophy is meerly verbal, speculative, abstractive, formal and notional, fit to fill the brains with monstrous and airy Chymaeras, speculative, and fruitless con-ceits, but not to replenish the intellect with sound knowledge, and demonstrative verity, not to lead men practically to dive into the internal center of natures abstruse, and occult operations: But is only conversant about the shell, and husk, handling the accidental, external and recollacious qualities of things, confusedly, and continually tumbling over obscure, ambiguous, general and equivocal terms²⁵

Webster's utilitarian motive is clear. Moreover, his approval of the Cartesian philosophy and the neo-Epicureanism of Gassendi is unqualified.²⁶ As a mid-century scientific propaganda tract of recognised importance,²⁷ the Academiarum Examen will enable us to sort out the differing views of the New Science held by Glanvill, Casaubon, and Du Moulin. Hostility to the New Science was especially strong in the Universities, a fact which is explained partly by the baleful attacks on them, and partly by the natural conservatism of old institutions.

The situation was aggravated by the Church's unhappy policy of opposing scientific discoveries and new ideas,²⁸ which was really a collision between dogmatic and revisionist points of view. The Puritan origin, hearty invective, and democratic practicality of Webster's book necessarily ruffled University clergymen who had been nurtured on St. Thomas and Aristotle and who made up a self-conscious aristocracy of humanism.²⁹

But if Bacon, Webster's spiritual godfather, had directed the attack on disputatious scholasticism and stressed practicality,³⁰ he had also conjured up a dazzling prospect. As he denounced investigative systems based on authorities and ancient books, he also evoked, with Salomon's House in the New Atlantis (1627), the limitless horizons of collective research. Thus early, he caught the century's trend to such scientific organizations as the Accademia del Cimento of Florence (1657-1667), the Academie des Sciences (1688), the Royal Society (1667), and the Berlin Academy (1700).³¹ Despite the patronage of Charles II, the Puritan forerunners of the Royal Society during the Interregnum helped bring the Society and its virtuosi under attack during the Restoration. The Society therefore came to need both an historian and an apologist, and it found them in Thomas Sprat and Joseph Glanvill. Since Puritans and Episcopalians had been able to bury their differences in those scientific meetings during the Interregnum, it is not surprising that both Sprat and Glanvill chose to defend the Society as Anglicans.³² Glanvill helped touch off the drum-fire of propaganda in the Restoration with The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). Flashily presenting Bacon's arguments in Browne's prose, Glanvill "play'd with the Dogmatist in a personated Scepticism; and would not have the design of the whole discourse measur'd by the seeming tendency of this part on't."³³ But the indulgence he craved was not forthcoming, for he infuriated his solemn enemies by irreverent sarcasm. "That the Aristotelian Philosophy is an huddle of words and terms insignificant," he offered, "hath been the censure of the wisest: And that both its Basis and Superstructure are Chimaerical; cannot be unobserv'd by them, that know it, and are free to judge it."³⁴ However imposing, the scholastic philosophy and divinity were but a windy diet:

The Intellect, that can feed on this air, is a Chamaelion; and a meer inflated skin. From this stock grew School-divinity, which is but Peripateticism in a Theological Livery. A Schoolman is the Ghost of the Stagirite, in a body of condensed Air; and Thomas but Aristotle sainted.³⁵

Republished in 1664 as Scepsis Scientifica, the work acquired a dedication to the Royal Society which probably brought Glanvill's admission to the group.³⁶ Though Glanvill echoed the revered Bacon by conceiving scientific skepticism as a temporary suspension of judgment until evidence justified asserting general principles, because of his barbs the harm was done. It was easy to blur the difference between Glanvill's viewpoint, wherein a limited degree of skepticism was a preparative for knowledge of material things, and philosophical skepticism. Based as it was upon the non-experimental methodology of the Greeks, and usually confined to metaphysical subjects, philosophical skepticism taught the impossibility of attaining certain knowledge. It was the antithesis of the rational theology taught by both Anglican and Roman churches, and almost certainly led to the atheism and fideism which those churches denounced.³⁷ The Society was easy to attack on ground of skepticism. But there was other danger also, for the scientists in the group had made the idea of atoms in motion an integral part of their thinking, and thus their foes could connect them with Hobbes. Consequently, the Society had to disclaim both skepticism and the Malmesbury dogmatist.³⁸ It also had to counter the raillery of Court wits, who were asking what the amateurs of the Society had accomplished.³⁹ It is against this background that the controversy involving Glanvill, Casaubon, and Du Moulin was fought.

Writing in prose that was lucid, flexible, and exact, Sprat skillfully parried the thrusts of the peripatetics. His task was one of conciliation, justification, and definition. Whereas Glanvill angered conservatives with sarcasm, Sprat soothed them insofar as he could. Paying tribute to the "Criticks, and Philologists" who had scrubbed up the learning of Antiquity, he thought that "the Monuments of the Antients, will be wonderfully advantageous to us"—provided that mastering them were not made a lifelong task—"if they be imploy'd, to direct us in the ways, that we ought to proceed, in knowledge for the future; if by shewing us what has been already finish'd, they point out to us, the most probable means, to accomplish what is behind."⁴⁰ Beginning his greater work of proving that science and religion are not inimical, Sprat admits, as others have done since, that "I am not ignorant, in what a slippery place I now stand, and what a tender matter I am enter'd upon."⁴¹ He rightly anticipates the vilification sure to come, ostensibly from a zeal for the Lord, from nettled conservatives--"a fault which is very incident to men of devotion."⁴² He strikes a note of modernity in remarking that, for those who think independently, the disgruntled "have strait the reproachful Term of Atheist to cast upon them; which though it be a Title that ought only to be employ'd against the bold and insolent defiers of Heaven in their words and actions, yet it is too frequently us'd to express the malice of any eager and censorious spirit, that has the confidence to object it."⁴³ Such a caution was well taken because of the tendency to link the Society and Hobbes; atheist was a term which frequently adorned Casaubon's later treatises. Then, too, the Society had banished theology from its discussions. As Sprat presents it, this approach would strengthen natural religion by scientific experiment, and avoid forbidden knowledge. As for God, Sprat writes, "they meddle no otherwise with Divine things, than only as the Power, and Wisdom, and Goodness of the Creator, is display'd in the admirable order, and workman-ship of the Creatures."⁴⁴ Sprat walks on somewhat shakier ground, though he hedges a bit, when he declares that as a result of physiological studies, "there, without question, be very near ghessees made, even at the more exalted, and immediate actions of the Soul; and that too, without destroying its Spiritual and Immortal Being."⁴⁵

Two other tasks confronted Sprat, which both involved reconciling

the New Science with that Anglican emphasis upon law and reason which had been Hooker's legacy. First, if Sprat could then scarcely fuse empirical science and Thomism, he could at least try to find their intentions compatible, and in accomplishing this dissociate the New Science from Puritanism as well as explain away any religious indifference within the Society. For assistance, he called on the bugbear of Enthusiasm, which Casaubon himself had already denounced. Recalling the violent eruptions of Puritan religious fervor, Sprat observed that "It is now impossible to spread the same clouds over the World again: The universal Disposition of this Age is bent upon a rational Religion"⁴⁶ By refusing to seek (as the Puritans usually did) "in every Turn of human Actions many supernatural Providences, and miraculous Events," Sprat pointed out, the Society was not diminishing God's majesty. As Sprat said, " . . . it is enough for the honour of his Government, that he guide the whole Creation in its wonted course of Causes and, Effects; as it makes as much for the reputation of a Prince's wisdom, that he can rule his subjects peaceably, by his known, and standing Laws, as that he is often forc'd to make use of extraordinary justice to punish, or reward."⁴⁷ After charging some scientists' lukewarm religion to a disgust over Enthusiasm, Sprat finds the Church of England especially fitted to advance the New Science. "If we compare the changes to which Religion has bin always subject," he says, "with the present face of things, we may safely conclude, that whatever vicissitude shall happen about it in our time, it will probably neither be to the advantage of implicit Faith [Rome], nor of Enthusiasm

[Puritanism], but of Reason" [Anglicanism].⁴⁸

Sprat's second task was attractively to define the Society's intellectual position--a difficult task because the pool of philosophy could be (and was) easily muddled. As he had done when discussing religion, Sprat again took a sensible middle way, this time between philosophical skepticism on one hand, and dogmatism ancient and modern (this meant Hobbes) on the other.⁴⁹ He had already put the Stagirite and the Sage of Malmesbury, and others like him, cheek by jowl in the same compartment when he classified as "Modern Dogmatists" those who, having deposed the tyranny of the Ancients (especially Aristotle), erect in their place modern systems of speculation whose principles are asserted too quickly and therefore also end in a fruitless effort. He also included those who renounced Aristotelianism only to restore some other ancient philosophy (probably atomistic or Pyrrhonic) instead.⁵⁰ As for classical skepticism, he explains, the Society is "as farr from being Scepticks, as the greatest Dogmatists themselves. The Scepticks deny all, both Doctrines, and Works. The Dogmatists determine on Doctrines, without a sufficient respect to Works; and this Assembly . . . have been very positive and affirmative in their Works." The Society concentrates upon the particulars, from which general principles can in time be deduced.⁵¹ Much more than any one philosopher, the Society's collective effort can attain such "wariness and coldness of thinking, and vigorous examination; as is needful, to a solid assent, and to a lasting conclusion, on the whole frame of Nature."⁵² The Society's position of scientific skepticism we shall meet again in connection with witchcraft. As evidence of the Society's work, Sprat's History also included papers by such Society stalwarts as Lord Brouncker, Sir William Petty, and Hooke,⁵³ which show that the group's accomplishments were rather slender to date.

But meanwhile, Glanvill also had been working on a book intended to vindicate the new experimental science by its intellectual and practical accomplishments. He awaited the appearance of Sprat's book--presented to the Society on 10 October 1667--to see what revision should then be made in his own work.⁵⁴ Aside from wishing to help the Society of which he was a member, Glanvill had a personal motive for publishing his book. He had been attacked as an atheist by a choleric Puritan minister, Robert Crosse, who was a staunch Aristotelian in philosophy and a Puritan in theology--a "Man of Gath."⁵⁵ The quarrel arose when some sprightly local students brought Glanvill into Crosse's presence as the crotchety minister was dealing justice to the Royal Society as a Jesuitical conspiracy, and extolling Aristotle. When Glanvill defended the Society, Crosse made this a personal matter, and allegedly wrote a book against Glanvill, which the licensers at the university presses refused. The squabble then became the sport of wags in the local coffee-houses.⁵⁶ When Glanvill's book appeared, it remedied the shortcomings of Sprat's History with a fuller account of achievements by the experimental method. Probably because of Glanvill's experience with Crosse, his polemics against scholasticism had been sharpened to a razor edge. Its title was Plus Ultra: Or, the Progress and Advancement of Knowledge Since the Days of Aristotle. In an Account of some of the most Remarkable Late Improvements of Practical, Useful Learning: To Encourage Philosophical Endeavours. Occasioned By a Conference with one of the Notional Way (London, 1668). In itself the clearest statement for the New Science, Plus Ultra drew from Meric Casaubon the most acute criticism uttered by the conservative, humanistic camp. It was through Peter Du Moulin that the issues of the New Science were brought into their sharpest focus.

The problem was far more than a blind fondness for old, settled ways, or an equally blind enthusiasm for the gospel of progress offered by new ones. As was clearly seen at the time, it was a philosophical crisis which eventually would have far-reaching effects upon society as a whole, and especially upon an England which had already seen enough intellectual dislocation for some time to come. About all that could be said against scholasticism had already been voiced by Bacon, Webster, and others; no need to repeat it. Glanvill gathers it all up in stating the purpose of Plus Ultra:

. . . to encourage the freer and better disposed Spirits, to vigour and endeavour in the pursuits of Knowledge; and to raise the capable and ingenuous, from a dull and drowsie acquiescence in the Discoveries of former Times; by representing the great Encouragements we have to proceed, from modern Helps and Advancements In which, I confess, I had a principal eye upon the ROYAL SOCIETY, and the Noble Purposes of that Illustrious Assembly, which I look upon as the great ferment of useful and generous Knowledge⁵⁷

However much Glanvill might have wished to abolish scholasticism, he prudently championed in Plus Ultra a balanced synthesis of old and new. His attitude is perhaps not that of a philosopher, but of an apologist for practicality who can see how the old may contribute to the new. He suggests a nominal compromise. The customary "first Studies," he thinks, should be retained to fulfill statutory requirements. "Nor do I deny," he adds, "but that those Speculations raise, quicken, and what the Understanding, and on that account may not be altogether unprofitable, with respect to the more useful Inquisitions; Provided It keep it self from being nice, airy, and addicted too much to general Notions. But this is the danger, and the greatest part run upon the Rock."⁵⁸ This might be avoided in two ways. One would be "if the Mathematicks and Natural History were mingled with these other Studies, which would indeed be excellent Preparatives and Dispositions to future Improvements." Secondly, the "young Philosophers" should not consider "their Systematick notions as the bounds and perfections of Knowledge," and ought not take these theories "as establish'd and infallible certainities," but "consider them in the modest sense of Hypotheses" helping to better knowledge."⁵⁹ Glanvill manipulates two symbols--Aristotle and Robert Boyle--to develop his arguments. He never quite approves of Aristotle, but will "give cheerful Acknowledgements to his Rhetorick, History of Animals, and Mechanicks, and could wish that these were more studied by his devoted Admirers"⁶⁰ Because Glanvill's study of the "notional and disputing" parts of Aristotle had allegedly delayed his survey of God's works in Nature, Glanvill professed that his zeal for God's manifest glory "hath inspired me with some smartness and severity against those Heathen Notions which have so unhappily diverted learned men from the study of Gods GREAT BOOK, UNIVERSAL NATURE," and thus robbed the Almighty.⁶¹ Moreover, Aristotle did not personally cover the range of knowledge, but used unreliable hearsay, and even then twisted evidence to fit preconceived theories.⁶² As a contrast to Aristotle, Glanvill offers Robert Boyle--a wise choice, because Boyle's piety, stainless character, and scientific achievements demonstrated the utility of the New Science and its harmony with religion.⁶³ Two sections of Plus Ultra--Chapters XIII and XIV--are taken up with Glanvill's description of Boyle's scientific accomplishments, personal character, and published and unpublished writings for mankind's material welfare and betterment.⁶⁴ To forestall attacks on the Royal Society on grounds of being dangerous to the Church and Universities, Glanvill had already furnished a long list--starting with the two Archbishops--of the distinguished clergymen of the Establishment and Universities who were members of the Society.⁶⁵ "For whoever phancieth or suggests," he declares, that the Universities are undermined by the Society "casts a black Character upon the sagacity and faithfulness of those Reverend Men, who all have been Eminent Members of one or other of those Schools of Learning; and most of them do still retain a Relation to those ancient and venerable Bodies."⁶⁶ This, in part, is the case which Glanvill made, and for which he supplied formidable buttresses.

As we have seen from Glanvill's altercation with Grosse, arguments about the New Science had filtered out to the provinces, and naturally to ecclesiastical centers. Because Du Moulin brought the matter to his attention, Casaubon entitled his reply to Glanvill A Letter of Meric Casaubon D.D. &c. to Peter du Moulin D.D. and Prebendarie of the same Church: Concerning Natural experimental Philosophie, and some books lately set out about it (Cambridge, 1669). In view of the well-known infirmities of Casaubon,⁶⁷ it would be easy to consider his reply as the view of a crabbed, hopeless conservative. If this criticism is sometimes true of his later writings, in his Letter to Peter Du Moulin Casaubon put his finger unerringly not on the danger of the New Science, but on the empty and chaotic moral order into which enthusiasm for a blindly materialistic education would lead. Truth, whatever it is, looks to the future; and like Janus, it looks also to the past. Intelligent conservatism may clearly show the dangerous extremes of a trend, but it may be unable to offer a satisfactory alternative. This was the intellectual tragedy of Casaubon. Du Moulin appears in a less philosophical but more pleasant light. He had often discussed the issue with Casaubon, taking the part of the New Science. Their long discussions did not ruffle the conversations of the two old friends; Du Moulin humorously appreciated Casaubon's foibles, while the aging scholar allowed for a difference in views. Du Moulin obtained Glanvill's new book, which seemed to provide more ammunition for his friendly arguments with Casaubon. One day when Casaubon was conferring with two young University men, he recalled to Du Moulin, "you came with a book in your hand, and delivered it to me with a smiling countenance, which, as soon as I had opened the book [and seen Glanvill's title], I did interpret, having already contested with you more than once about the matter, as though by it you hoped to stop my mouth forever. I cannot say you did intend it so really: but so I did interpret it then; but it did fall out much otherwise."⁶⁸ After viewing the title page alone, Casaubon admitted, "I was much confirmed in my former opinion, and professed it so to you, which occasioned much discourse between us until I was weary, and (as my condition is now) somewhat spent."⁶⁹ The question had been

. . . whether this way of Philosophy, of late years much cried up in London and elsewhere; was, as set out by some, more likely to prove advantageous, or prejudicial, if not destructive, to good learning: by which I mean (not excluding natural Philosophy) what in former ages of the world, and by many to this day (by you also, I make no question) hath been and is accounted true, solid, and useful learning: which hath been cherished and countenanced by Kings and Princes in Publick States, in their generations, in all places of Europe hitherto; and hath gotten credit and admiration to the Owners and Professours of it during their lives, and after their death, immortal fame.⁷⁰

Here is the case ipso facto for the body of humanist learning, a legacy from Antiquity which "Owners and Professours of it"—such as Casaubon—had made available, to their "immortal fame." But this learning was not valuable for its bulk, or because of the vanity of its professors. It provided a rational and meaningful frame of reference for the human being. What if it were removed? Casaubon states the humanists' case as no paraphrase could:

For if nothing must be accounted useful, (as some seem to determine) but what doth afford some use for the necessities, or conveniences of this present life; I do not know but that a Brewer, or a Baker, a skilful Horse-leech, or a Smith, or the like, may contest in point of true worth or desert with many, who for their learning, as then thought, have been reputed generally, the great Lights and Ornaments of their age: though such, as never medled in their writings with experimental philosophy. They that beleave that man doth consist of two chief parts, the body and a soul, whereof the soul the more noble and more considerable part, as even Heathens most of them have determined it: natural reason will oblige them to beleave, that a greater share of care and provision doth belong to that which is immortal, from the right ordering of which all true happiness, present or future, doth depend; then to that which is mortal, and naturally brutish, and of little continuance.⁷¹

As shown by Epictetus and his commentators, it is a rhetorical question

Whether those men who make it their work to reclaim men

from that προπᾶθεια, or close adherence of the mind to the body and senses (which most men are naturally prone to) to the care and culture of their souls, ought in reason to be accounted unprofitable to the Common-wealth; or rather, of all Professions, the most useful and necessary.⁷²

Thus, if he could not envision a substitute for the old humanistic learning, or even see how it could be sifted and revised to fit changing times,⁷³ Casaubon "dip[t] into the future" further than the eye of materialism could see.

How did he come to grips with Glanvill, and were there any points of agreement between them? Certain embarrassments, public and private, required a wary approach. "But before I enter upon the business," Casaubon admitted, "I must make my way by removing of a block, which I meet with artificially laid by some, to fright us in our progress, and hinder the freedom of our enquiry."⁷⁴ As a recipient of royal bounty, and with his church superiors active in the Royal Society, Casaubon could not be rash. He had to disengage Glanvill from the shield of Royal prestige---"that Sacred name" Charles II; to do so, he pointed out that because of the differing judgments of its members, the Royal Society did not necessarily sanction their private utterances. Consequently, "a man may write against the opinions of some of the Royal Society; yea and censure them as they may deserve, without any reflection at all upon the Royal Founder, or Royal Society in general."⁷⁵ Boyle was another problem, because of the nearly universal respect for him and because of his friendship with Du Moulin. "I know your relations," Casaubon addressed Du Moulin, "to some of eminent worth and piety in that Honourable Society, whom though we have not the happiness to know otherwise, then by the fame of their writings; yet we honour their worth as much as you do. I hope you do not think any thing I have written can reflect upon any such."⁷⁶ Coming to the matter of natural investigation per se, Casaubon sought a hearing in the enemy camp by professing himself "studious" of natural science from his youth and "still a great lover and honourer of it."⁷⁷ Reflecting Calvin, he conceded that for the man of grace and secure faith, a deeper knowledge of Nature than illiterate admiration "may afford somewhat . . . to the glory of God, and acknowledgement of his Power and Wisdom"⁷⁸ The issue, then, was the emphasis misplaced by those "who do so magnifie this study, as though there were no other wisdom in the world to be thought of, or pursued after; that make it the only useful, true, solid learning, to which they would have all Schools and Universities fitted"⁷⁹

Against the New Science's advertising slogan of usefulness--for which the Creator's manifested glory, power, and wisdom often appears to be mere window dressing--Casaubon raised the sobering question: What really is the most useful? This he flanked with two cogent arguments--the danger of forbidden knowledge,⁸⁰ and the horror of atheism. It is doubtful, he warned, "that God will give a blessing to such a violent pursuit, that will not keep within its bounds, but . . . doth aspire to an absolute Sovereignty over all, that in so many ages of the world hath been accounted useful learning and knowledge."⁸¹ Because of its emphasis on matter and second causes, moreover, the New Science is "very apt to be abused and degenerate into Atheism."⁸² On this point, Casaubon reveals the same basic fear which lies behind the witchcraft literature and demonology to which he, Glanvill, and Du Moulin severally contributed.⁸³ As to the existence of spirits and therefore the soul, why, he asks, should the Aristotelian (or Platonic?) metaphysics be abolished as merely notional and abstract, when the much-praised system of Descartes is abstract too? Casaubon then shrewdly makes the point that to some extent either system rests upon what the thinker feels to be a clear and distinct notion of truth.⁸⁴ "To me truly," he concludes, it is no good sign that this secondary kind of Theology, or Divinity . . . is so out of request. But Natural Philosophy I grant is more taking and bewitching generally; there is a plain reason for it: and though cried up for the only useful knowledge, yet if well considered, it may be found sometimes, to have more of pleasure and curiosity in it than use and profit; even in that sense (for what is truly useful and profitable, or most useful and profitable, is another question) which they intend.⁸⁵

The point on which Glanvill and Casaubon most nearly approach agreement--the retention, to some extent, of scholastic discipline--is also a major point of difference. Glanvill had favored using earlier portions of the curriculum (with caution) to whet students' wits. He had also liked Aristotle's "Rhetoric, History of Animals, and Mechanicks," though he obviously preferred "the more useful Inquisitions" (the New Science). But there was no mention of ethical or metaphysical works, an omission perhaps reflecting the amoral character of the new philosophy of method. Casaubon, on the other hand, dwelt lovingly upon the Ethics, "that incomparable piece" of which "in all ages, even since Christianity, many thousands have reaped the fruit" ⁸⁶ Casaubon next considers the professional standing of Aristotle the naturalist, which raises the touchy question of experience, method, abstract system, and preconception. In the Ethics and Metaphysics, he points out, Aristotle prefers experience without art (or method) to art without experience. It is true, of course, that the Stagirite considers systematic speculation "which doth look into the causes, and can give satisfactory reasons of events, more commendable, then illiterate or irrational, though successful experience."⁸⁷ This insistence upon rational understanding, Casaubon feels, makes it unlikely that Aristotle would have framed theories "not grounded at all, upon particular observation." It is "very possible" for Aristotle to be mistaken or defective in particular observations, but these may be rectified "and thereupon his Theories, by men of judgement and ingenuity, amended or perfected." With an ear to the New Science's watchword Utility and an eye to its still haphazard experiments, Casaubon points out that "particular observations until they be reduced to art or theories, that is, to general rules or maxims (which is the highest operation of the rational faculty) are not much useful"88 The point on which Glanvill and Casaubon most nearly agree, then, is that there must be some admixture of old and new in university curricula, with Glanvill accepting the traditional rudiments as a whetstone and Casaubon urging the discipline's continuation, subject to revision.

If Glanvill's zeal for the Lord had inspired him "with some smartness and severity against . . . Heathen Notions," Casaubon put him in far worse than heathen company. Conceding that Glanvill "can express himself smartly upon very light occasions," Casaubon drily remarks that, but for this busy zeal, "I should have been very suspicious, if not confident, he had borrowed all this goodly language from some profane Chymist, such as our Robert Fludd was, with whom such professions of zeal for the glory of God are very frequent and ordinary But it is indeed the common language of all extravagant Chymists: they all . . . insist upon the same thing."⁸⁹

Since apologists for the New Science so frequently attacked the scholasticism taught in the Universities, Casaubon's views on the subject need clarification. The Deism found in Lord Herbert of Cherbury's treatise De Veritate, Casaubon distrusted as "a new Religion."⁹⁰ On the other hand, far too many persons "taught by Epicurus and his mates [including Hobbes], are apt to despise and vilifie the "admirable Works of the Creation" as being the works not of a wise God, but blinde atoms"91 Rejecting both Deism and the philosophy of Hobbes, Casaubon believed reasoning and dispute to be inevitable concomitants of the Christian faith--"who can expect, or imagine, that any other course can be available to the maintenance of true Christianity?"⁹² In view of the irascibility found in his other writings, does this statement show a relish for controversy only? Because Meric Casaubon was a child of his age, it is easy to be unkind to him. Several considerations, however, help us to a clearer understanding of his real position. Like his father, he was committed to the Anglican tradition of historical Christianity, including the mysteries of the faith. Holding thus, he had to reject Herbert's design "out of the Religions of mankind to extract a Religion that should need no Christ."⁹³ Because he therefore believed in a faintly anthropomorphic spiritual realm, as his witchcraft writings show, he rejected the materialistic determinism of Hobbes, with its atheistic emptiness. The frenetic enthusiasm of the Puritans he considered a mental aberration. As a savant, he realized that the thorny points of Christian dogma would perhaps always require defense and explanation.⁹⁴ As a Christian humanist, Casaubon felt that faith and reason must be reconciled, and therefore he clung, as a man of intelligence, to a viewpoint which in his experience accomplished this. He therefore belongs in the Anglican tradition of rational theology stemming from Hooker. However accurately he projected the line of the new scientific thought to its direst point, he did not suggest--who could have?--a really adequate bridge over the new chasm between faith and reason, science and theology. Because of the magnitude of such a task in a world of growing materialism, the literature of the last century swells with a desperation, of which Casaubon's words seem prophetic:

And certainly, when and where men (whether through force, or want of good learning) shall be made incapable to uphold their faith with sound reasoning and disputing (which they call wrangling) what will be the issue, or who will get by it, any man may guess.⁹⁵

But as men became understandably tired of heated dispute and sought cool refuge in science and mathematics, Casaubon's words went unheard.⁹⁶

In the light of the New Science's reception, we best find Peter Du Moulin's intellectual temper, which is not entirely clear in his political writings or sermons. Judging from his extensive polemics, one would have to conclude that he was only an opportunist who could whip up a synthetic wrath, or else that he was a singularly angry man of God. The bitter virility of his prose and verse denunciations of the Puritans and Milton seems to confirm this. His connection with the controversies over science and witchcraft, however, helps to correct this impression, and reveals a personality which has the attractiveness of good sense. The sources for such information are three: his correspondence with Robert Boyle about the New Science; his masterpiece, A Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind; and a number of incidental Latin Poems which show his characteristic ideas, attitudes, and friendships, particularly with Meric Casaubon and the Boyle family. His personality is further revealed by verse to his associates at Canterbury. While John Webster fulminated against university discipline in the Academiarum Examen (1654) and John Milton, in shadowboxing with an unknown assailant, wrongly hit Alexander More in the Defensio Secunda (1654) and the Pro Se Defensio (1655), that secret adversary—Du Moulin—was improving his fortune with the high nobility. He had been retained by Richard ("the Rich") Boyle, later Earl of Burlington and Cork and Lord High Treasurer of Ireland, to act as tutor to his sons Richard and Charles Boyle, later Viscount Dungarvan. Thus introduced to perhaps the wealthiest family in England and Ireland, Du Moulin was brought into a pleasant contact with the uncle of his young charges, Robert Boyle; and with their aunt, Lady Ranelagh.⁹⁷ Du Moulin's correspondence with Robert Boyle shows a mutually cordial relationship, and further develops his interest in the New Science shown during the argument between Glanvill and Casaubon. Though his activities reviewed so far have obscured the fact, Du Moulin was a neo-Latin poet of distinction,⁹⁸ and had composed a considerable amount of verse, collected in Petri Molinaei P.F. ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ. Poematum Libelli Tres . . . (Cambridge, 1670).⁹⁹ Du Moulin dedicated the book to Robert Boyle,¹⁰⁰ and wrote him from Canterbury on 28 December 1669 begging him to accept the dedication.¹⁰¹ Attracted to the New Science, partly at least, by his friendship with Boyle, Du Moulin had wanted to include a poem praising the Royal Society. But the years 1668-1669 had seen the scientific controversy develop with the books of Glanvill and Casaubon, and Du Moulin's role in it brought difficulties. Du Moulin hoped that Boyle, through the apparent harmony of his religious and scientific interests, could ease the situation, and wrote him in some distress:

One of the prime licensers of the book, Dr. Gunning, would not suffer the heroics in commendation of the Royal Society to be printed with their fellows. It grieves me to see a feud between that noble Society and the Universities, to which Mr. Glanvill's books have much contributed. Your great credit, prudence, and moderation, may stop that growing evil, if any thing in the world can.¹⁰²

Since the volume included a poem to Gunning written in the friendliest terms,¹⁰³ the licenser's behavior was personally ungracious. It also showed the extent of the real bitterness created by the book war, and when the first edition of ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ appeared, the poem in question was omitted. But when the second edition appeared in 1671, a new title page had been supplied, as well as an Incrementum containing more poems, including the one to the Royal Society. As a later note (Canterbury, 3 July 1671) to Boyle shows, Du Moulin had outwitted the licenser:

The first time that I asked a license to print my Πόρεργα at Cambridge, Dr. Gunning got it upon condition, that the verses to the Royal Society were put out of the manuscript.

But the license for the Incrementum, where the verses are, was got in his absence.¹⁰⁴

Appearing as the final selection in ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, the poem, entitled

Pro Regia Societate Londinensi 'ETERNITAS, is pleasant to read. But unfortunately, in praising the Society the poem dwelt on several ideas which had become anathema to such critics as Casaubon. The tired old world was virtually to be renewed by these divinely sent allies of the Almighty, who, with clear vision unimpeded by Aristotelian logic or systems which distorted reality, would compel Nature--including the universe--to give up her secrets; allies who would bring through knowledge and utility a never-ending progress to the world, who would cause agriculture to flourish, who would spread wisdom--and trade--to the ends of the earth.¹⁰⁵ The poem is much better than the verdict of R. F. Jones would suggest--"a mediocre performance of two or three pages"¹⁰⁶--and is comparable to the praise of the Society by Cowley and Dryden.¹⁰⁷ While it is fervent in its praise of the Society and what it may do, and is, as one would expect from a staunch Calvinist, not warm to the scholastic discipline, the poem is scarcely belligerent in tone. It therefore emphasizes through the pious behavior of Gunning how far the anger and alarm over the Society's activities had gone. It also displays Du Moulin's receptivity to new ideas.

A more complete grasp of his views, however, involves a survey of other works. If favorable to the New Science, how, for example, did he react to the varieties of skepticism which give a tone of modernity to the Restoration? One could welcome a more explicit statement of this, as also of his theory of the nature and purpose of education, for he was caught in the quarrel about this crucial issue. There is also the tantalizing question of how he--to say nothing of such cool intellects as Boyle and Glanvill--could simultaneously have faith in science and in witches without being aware of some inconsistency. And finally, since Du Moulin was a poet and creative writer, some estimate of his stature and limitations as an author is needed. These questions are most easily approached through his Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind,¹⁰⁸ which, besides his poems, is his most revelatory work.

The Treatise was in part a reaction against the Pyrrhonism infused into English thought by Montaigne and his disciple Charron.¹⁰⁹ It was their classical skepticism from which the New Science had to separate itself; and their teaching of man's nescience, through influential Roman Catholic apologists, sometimes became a prelude to the acceptance of religious faith on the authority claimed by Rome.¹¹⁰ The French skeptical writers, Bredvold has observed, contributed in England "to the pagan culture, the cynicism, and naturalistic ethics which gradually were diffused throughout English society, at least in the upper strata, before 1660."¹¹¹ This is, of course, to say nothing of the England of Charles II. In his Petit traité de la sagesse (1606), Charron, though a priest, had appeared a man of the world and considered wisdom both Stoic and Pyrrhonistic in a secular way.¹¹² With Charron's cardinal definition--"Wisdom is a sweet and regular managing of the soule"¹¹³--Du Moulin had no quarrel; peace and contentment of mind was the aim of both authors. Their approach, however, differed widely. As Du Moulin interpreted him, Charron dangerously gave to human wisdom what belonged to divine, and depicted theological wisdom as such a slattern that "One would say, that he is drawing the picture of some old bare-footed Capucine Sister."¹¹⁴ Against "the stream of a great torrent, so I call the numerous abettors of Charron,"¹¹⁵ Du Moulin tried to show that the wisdom which must work in us that excellent effect [peace of mind], is Divine Wisdom."¹¹⁶ While praising the "masculine and lofty spirit" of Charron,¹¹⁷ Du Moulin hoped that "we may restore to Religion that which Charron takes from it," and return Theological Wisdom to her primacy.¹¹⁸ Human wisdom, however, is not to be despised; she is "not only the servant, but the daughter of Divine Wisdom, from which all true moral wisdom is descended. And when that daughter goeth astray from her Mother, she must be brought to her again, and put in mind of her duty."¹¹⁹ Although Du Moulin, when we consider his works broadly, is a writer of ability, he made no pretense of being a systematic philosopher. Therefore, his attitude toward skepticism and Cartesianism—he refers to "That prime Philosopher of our Age Monsieur des Cartes"¹²⁰—must to an extent be conjectured. When he awarded the palm to theological wisdom, he clearly objected to grounding morality in the relativity of secular philosophy. And while he was, as we shall see, a Calvinist at heart, one gets the impression, because of his status as an Anglican divine and his friendliness to the New Science, that he would have objected to fideism and supported rational theology as found in Hooker. His admiration for Descartes may have been superficial, for the phrase quoted occurs as Du Moulin quibbles with the Frenchman about definitions of the passions of generosity and pride. His attitude toward philosophy is then, on the whole, utilitarian.

The superiority he gives theological to human wisdom is summarized when he declares that "all the Learning that we lay up must end in Prudence."¹²¹ Perhaps the closest he comes to a definition of Prudence is "To judg wisely of the businesses of the world",¹²² and Prudence both scholarship and practical experience must develop.¹²³ "Prudence is above Science in dignity, but Science precedeth Prudence in order, as the means go before the end," he explains. "This position that prudence is the end, and sciences are the means, gives the true light to choose those sciences that deserve a serious study," Du Moulin asserts. "Sciences are multiplyed to a great number, and grown to a goodly perfection in this Western world. They have their several uses and beauties."¹²⁴ Utility it is which determines the individual's emphasis in learning, and God's intentions for man are perfectly clear:

For there are some sciences, which, though especially profest by some, belong alike to all, and regard the profession of man as he is man. For God hath created and placed us in the world to learn three things; How the world is made, What the world doth, And what we must do in the world. How the world is made, we learn by natural Philosophy, the Sphere and Cosmography. What the world doth, we learn by Histories. What must be done in the world we learn out of Ethicks and Politicks, and especially out of Divinity. These Sciences are beneficial and delightful; and to be altogether ignorant of these, is to live in the world, not knowing for what.

A prudent man will pick out of these what is most fit for his principal end, which is to glorify God, inform his judgment, order his life, and content himself.¹²⁵

Even if Du Moulin is practical rather than philosophical about educational discipline, and if his assumption of divine intent might be questioned, yet his viewpoint is not without merit. At the least, it is a pleasant respite from the peruke-pulling of Glanvill and Casaubon. His Calvinism, as adapted to the Anglican Church, was not committed to the peripatetic system, and because of his emphasis on utility, Du Moulin was able to fit experimental science into an educational framework that was on the whole balanced and harmonious. In his aversion to the scholastic discipline, Du Moulin seems to echo both his father and Sir Francis Bacon:

There are studies that have little lustre and less price, and yet by their severe garb go for wise and serious. Such is School-philosophy, which for three or four hundred years hath reigned in our Universities, and rough-casted Divinity with barbarous terms and crabbed distinctions. For as if School-men would outdo Pilates souldiers that crowned the head of our Saviour with thorns, they have habited his doctrine with thorns all about from top to toe, so thick that themselves can hardly see the day through. The writings of School-men are like Labyrinths, which in a little piece of ground have a very long and intricate way. For the learning of those Ages being confined within a short compass, those resolute and irrefragable Doctors (for so they stile one another) not being able to travel far, and yet eager of going, did but turn and wind within their narrow limits, and crost a thousand times the same way. It is scarce credible how little there is to learn in all that huge mass of harsh subtilty. It is true indeed that in all studies of men there is vanity, and the learning that succeeded that rusty learning hath a merrier vanity. But since it is so, that there is vanity in both, give me rather a fair and smoth vanity then a grim and haggard. Si nugas, saltem sint canorae. Serious fools are the most troublesome.¹²⁶

It is, then, from the viewpoint of Calvin's theology, as domesticated in the Established Church, that Du Moulin welcomed the New Science despite its taint of the Puritanism which he loathed. Because of his pragmatic nature, he apparently found the element of scientific skepticism acceptable. As a Calvinist and a man of prudence, he may possibly have thought that the dire future which his friend Casaubon predicted was somewhat exaggerated.

Seldom is the Janus visage of the Restoration more striking than in the peculiar relationship between religion, scientific skepticism as found in the New Science, and the outburst of serious literature about witchcraft and demonology. The principal contributors to such writings are figures we already know well--Du Moulin, Casaubon, Glanvill, Hobbes, Browne, Boyle, and the redoubtable John Webster. Whatever their positions might have been in the controversy between the New Science and the Universities, these warriors easily switched sides in the broomstick war. The losing camp--for witches--includes the greater catalogue of worthies: Du Moulin, Boyle, and Browne, with Glanvill serving as generalissimo and Casaubon, rather surprisingly, as his aide-de-camp. Attacking with a blunt vigor of thought and style, the slender winning forces--against witches--counted Hobbes and Webster. Though the argument about witchcraft was fairly old, it acquired new prestige when James VI of Scotland (later, as James I of England, the patron of the elder Du Moulin) published his Daemonologie in 1587. The quarrel flickered on during the Interregnum with the publication of Hobbes's Leviathan (1651),¹²⁷ which the Cambridge Platonist Dr. Henry More answered with his Antidote Against Atheism (1652). Continuing sporadically through the rest of this period, the debate flared up after the founding of the Royal Society and was climaxed in 1681, three years before the death of Du Moulin, with the posthumous publication by Henry More of Glanvill's Sadducismus Triumphatus. It is hardly necessary to rewrite Notestein's classic study of English witchcraft and its literature,¹²⁸ but a clearer picture is needed of Du Moulin's place in the argument.

Hobbes had grounded Religion in man's anxiety about the future and his wish to know, to be free from fear. While thus reducing Religion to a perennial form of wish projection, he made witchcraft a form of religious manifestation, especially of a belief that supernatural causes of the future can be known.¹²⁹ Hobbes' equation of Religion with wishful thinking, of course, reduced to nothing the providential theory which conservatives were desperately fighting to save. Du Moulin and Casaubon were on the ground early to keep God in the universe by means of familiar spirits. At the request of Robert Boyle, Du Moulin had translated and published The Divell of Mascon (1658), reporting the jaunt in 1612 of a sportive spirit to the home of Francois Ferreaud, a Huguenot minister in Burgundy. Meric Casaubon followed this in 1659 by editing a bizarre account of traffic with spirits by Dr. John Dee, the antediluvian chemist, mathematician, and judicial astrologer of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Its title was portentous—A True & Faithful Relation of What passed for many Yeers Between D^r. John Dee (A Mathematician of Great Fame in Q. Elis. and King James their Reignes) and Some Spirits: Tending (had it Succeeded) To a General Alteration of most States and Kingdomes in the World . . . (London, 1659). The book was strange, both in its own history and in its account of séances by Dee and his assistant Edward Kelley with such rulers as the Emperor Rudolph of Germany and King Stephen of Poland.¹³⁰ In his preface to the book, Casaubon stated the arguments which thereafter would be followed in writings to prove witchcraft:

The first [use] is against Atheists, and such as do not believe that there be any Divels or Spirits I do not know what can be more convincing then this sad Story, so exactly, so particularly, so faithfully delivered. Truly, they must see further then I do, that can finde what to answer (rationally) and to oppose: This is a great point, and a great ground of Religion; but this is not all: For if there be Spirits indeed, so wicked and malicious, so studious and so industrious, to delude men, and to do mischief, which is their end, all which is so fully represented in this Relation; then certainly it must follow, that there is a great over-ruling Power, that takes care of the Earth, and of the Inhabitants of it; of them especially that adore that Power, and worship it with true affection and sincerity: For without this over ruling Power, what a miserable World should we have?¹³¹

With the reprinting of Reginald Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft in 1665, the controversy gathered momentum, and reached its climax almost concurrently with the quarrel about the New Science. Glanvill answered Scot's old book (originally published in 1584) with A Philosophical Endeavour towards the Defense of the Being of Witches and Apparitions (London, 1666). Most of the first impression was destroyed in the Great Fire of London that autumn, and in 1667, as Sprat's History of the Royal Society and Milton's Paradise Lost were coming out, the book went into its second edition. The year 1668, with the publication of Plus Ultra, began the quarrel between Glanvill and Casaubon, but it also saw both divines contributing to the literature for witchcraft. Having acquired a new title page and some additional matter, Glanvill's Philosophical Endeavour appeared in a third edition entitled A Blow at Modern Sadducism In some Philosophical Considerations About Witchcraft. To which is added, The relation of the Fam'd Disturbance by the Drummer, In the House of Mr. John Mompasson: With some Reflections on Drollery and Atheisme. By a Member of the Royal Society. Except for a condensed version in Glanvill's Essays (1676), the work was eventually to reach its fullest form in the great witchcraft classic, Sadducismus Triumphatus (1661).¹³² Casaubon fired a broadside at Hobbes and the disparagement of witchcraft and the Ancients with Of Credulity and Incredulity, In things Natural, Civil, and Divine. Wherein, Among other things, the Sadducism of these times, in denying Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by pregnant instances and evidences, is fully confuted: Epicurus his cause, discussed, and the juggling and false dealing, lately used to bring Him, and Atheism, into credit, clearly discovered: the use and necessity of Ancient Learning, against the Innovating humour, all along proved and asserted . . . (London, 1668). Although Casaubon objected to credulity, he made his book primarily a corrective to incredulity, which he considered the danger of the age; and therefore directed his fire against skepticism, the Royal Society, Descartes, and atomistic philosophy, all of which he thought promoted disbelief.¹³³

It is by Glanvill's A Blow at Modern Sadducism that serious

witchcraft literature is thrust into its closest conjunction with the New Science. Not only did Glanvill link the book with the Royal Society on his title page, but the volume tries to adopt the method of the dawning science and to approach its philosophy. It is here that the apparently hopeless confusion in the thinking of Glanvill and Boyle, and perhaps Du Moulin, is cleared up. So contradictory has seemed his faith in science and in night-riding hags, that Glanvill (and others like him) has been taxed, even by a sympathetic biographer, with credulity and muddled thinking for justifying witchcraft.¹³⁴ Granted that it was an age of intellectual flux and that the New Science, despite its self-confidence, was embryonic, Glanvill manages a fair consistency in his thinking. How, after all, was one to vanquish an atheist? Airy philosophical speculation would not do, and the Witch of Endor could not really be resurrected if Scripture were no mutually acceptable authority. Taking his cue from Henry More,¹³⁵ Glanvill tried to meet the scoffer on his own ground by providing authenticated instances of spiritual intervention and witchcraft as tangible, material evidence. Therefore, following a separate title page promising "palpable Evidence of Spirits and Witchcraft,"¹³⁶ Glanvill produced in A Blow at Modern Sadducism, two letters to supply it. Addressed to William, Lord Brereton, one contained the now-familiar story of the Drummer of Tedworth,¹³⁷ and an account of the bewitching of a twelve-year-old boy, Richard Jones of Shepton Mallet in Somersetshire.¹³⁸ This case started Sunday, 15 November 1657, and ended with the condemnation of Jane Brooks, the alleged witch, at Charde Assizes on 26 March 1658. The second letter added by Glanvill was written to Dr. Henry More and discussed the Drummer of Tedworth.¹³⁹ Because his opposition sneered at witchcraft as fantastic, Glanvill sought a reasonable approach to explain the operation of witches and spirits. His own view was one of scientific skepticism, specifically that if some features of witchcraft seemed improbable, one should still beware of the vanity of dogmatizing that witches did not exist. He advanced--like a scientist, he hoped--cautious hypotheses which would explain, according to factual evidence of witchcraft trials, how witches and spirits might function; hypotheses which consequently could maintain at least the possibility of witches' existence.¹⁴⁰ Paradox though it be, it was such an attitude of scientific skepticism which, within the Janus mind of the seventeenth century, reconciled old witches and new science.

From just this viewpoint, Robert Boyle prevailed upon Peter Du Moulin to translate a Huguenot pastor's account of a diabolical visitation. First published in 1658, the book had reached a fourth edition by 1669. Its reappearance was timely, for in that year two fresh attacks were launched against witchcraft--The Question of Witchcraft Debated by John Wagstaffe, and the True Interpretation of the Witch of Endor by Lodowick Muggleton.¹⁴¹ Du Moulin's book was entitled The Divell of Mascon. Or, A true Relation of the chief things which an Vnclean Spirit did and said at Mascon in Burgundy, in the House of one Mr. Francis Pereaud, Minister of the Reformed Church in the same Town. Published in French lately by himselfe: and now made English by one that hath a particular knowledge of the truth of this Story (Oxford, 1669).¹⁴² In a commendatory letter first prefixed to this edition, Robert Boyle placed the account under the patronage of his name and that of the elder Du Moulin:

But the conversation I had with that pious Author during my stay at Geneva, and the present he was pleased to make me of this Treatise before it was Printed, in a place where I had opportunities to enquire both after the writer, and some passages of the Booke, did at length overcome in me (as to this narrative) all my settled indisposednesse to believe strange things. And since I find that you have received an account both of Monsieur Perreaud himself, and severall things relating to his booke from that great scholar and excellent person your Father; I have no reason to doubt, but that as your skill in the tongues, out of which and into which this treatise is to be translated, will bring it the greatest advantages that it can receive from a translators pen; So the reputation which your and your learned Fathers name will give it, will prove as effectuell as any thing of that nature can be, to make wary readers . . . believe even the amazing passages of it¹⁴³

In his dedicatory epistle to Robert Boyle, Du Moulin thought "this admirable story" was "worthy to be known of all men, and of singular use to convince the Atheists and half believers of these times:

Most of which will persuade themselves that there is no such thing in the world as any spiritual, immaterial, intelligent substance."¹⁴⁴ If they could only believe in devils, he continues, they would also believe in God. But in order "to confirm these pretenders to the title of strong wits in their pernicious unbelief"--and thus spread atheism--Satan was lying low, revealing himself only "to the rudest poor people, and the most bestiall natures in some remote barren heath" or to magicians of ill repute.¹⁴⁵ There were, of course, the Scriptural accounts of devils, all quite unacceptable to atheists. "But no history," Du Moulin professes, "either sacred or profane, ancient or moderne related such a voluntary, publique, continued, and undeniable manifestation of the wicked Spirit, as this doth."¹⁴⁶ It is valuable evidence, he points out, because the visitation occurred "not in a corner, but in the midst of a great City" before both Catholic and Protestant witnesses whom the sprite equally twitted. This brought the examination and confirmation of the incident by the local magistrate and diocesan bishop. Moreover, Perreaud himself, "a Religious well poised and venerable Divine, who (if he be alive still) is above 80 years of age," related the particulars to the elder Du Moulin "when he was President of a National Synod in these parts"¹⁴⁷ Thus cloaked with weighty prestige, the spirit, "a Witty Devil," whiffled at his listeners despite the frequent godly reproofs of Pastor Perreaud. Once he vented his diablerie upon a stubborn Catholic jurist who, in spite of Perreaud's objections, insisted on cross-examining him. When the tiresome questioning was done, the spirit took his turn, informing the crestfallen lawyer that "at this very time" a local citizen "is doing your business with your wife, and then revealed many secret foul dealings of the Lawyer, which made him appear a dishonest man."¹⁴⁸ The spirit then cut a merry caper with the confounded lawyer:

Then upon a sudden the whole company could see the man drawn by the arms into the midst of the room where the Devil whirled him about and gave him many turnes with great swiftnesse, and the man touching the ground with his toe [,] and then threw him down upon the floore with great violence. His friends took him up and carried him to his house where he lay sick, and distracted many dayes, giving by his example a lesson to all; that the Devil may be for a while a fair companion to them that will keep company with him, but will pay them in the end with torment and despaire.¹⁴⁹

After the deaths of Casaubon (1671) and Glanvill (1680), the witchcraft war moved on to the posthumous edition of Glanvill's Blow at Modern Sadducism in its fullest form, Sadducismus Triumphatus. Meanwhile, in 1670 the third part of Casaubon's Of Credulity and Incredulity was finally published,¹⁵⁰ and in 1672 the first two parts were reissued posthumously with a sensationalised title page which perverted the work's philosophical intent--A Treatise Proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by Pregnant Instances and Evidences: Together with other Things worthy of Note . . . (London, 1672). In 1676

Glanvill put out a shortened form of his Philosophical Endeavour,¹⁵¹ and the following year John Webster issued The Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft, which criticized Glanvill, Casaubon, and The Divell of Mascon. Glancing back to Casaubon's preface to Dee's book, Glanvill flatly stated the central proposition: "those that dare not bluntly say, Ther is NO GOD, content themselves, (fer a fair step, and Introduction) to deny there are SPIRITS, or WITCHES."¹⁵² This Webster flatly denied, maintaining that "the denying the existence of Angels or Spirits; or the Resurrection, doth not infer the denying of the Being of God; nor the denying of the existence of Witches . . . infer the denying of Angels or Spirits; and that they do unjustly charge the Authors of this opinion with Sadducism, we shall prove"¹⁵³ Rolling up his sleeves, Webster then belabors Casaubon and Glanvill and their books.

Though by writers against witchcraft and "the grave proceedings of many learned judges" these beliefs "were pretty well quashed," Webster finds that "two persons of great learning and note, . . . Dr. Casaubon and Mr. Glanvill, have afresh espoused so bad a cause, and taken the quarrel upon them; And to that purpose have newly furbished up the old weapons, and raked up the old arguments, forth of the Popish Sink and Dunghills, and put them into a new dress, that they might appear with the greater luster, and so do with Tooth and Nail labour to maintain the old rotten assertions"¹⁵⁴ Webster then exposed the illogic of reasoning from witch to spirit to God. Because God existed before spirits, who "are not immortal à parte anté," and because spirits existed before witches, the denial of witches is not a denial of spirits, nor to deny spirits to deny God. They are all separate. Therefore, even the denial of angels and spirits or witches, is not the denial of God, though denying the Creator would of course negate the creatures.¹⁵⁵ The assertion of Glanvill, Casaubon (and Du Moulin) is "but a poor fallacia consequentiae."¹⁵⁶ It is the Scriptures--here speaks Webster the Puritan--which "do with infallible certitude teach us, that both good and bad Spirits have most certainly an Existence." Therefore, "believe not them that say, If you would know the power of Devils and Witches, go to the writings of Dr. Casaubon, Mr. Glanvill, and to the rest of the Demonographers and Witchmongers, that amass and heap together all the lying, vain, improbable, and impossible stories that can be seraped forth of any Author"¹⁵⁷

Webster dismisses as "foolish" the usual features of witch lore--diabolical contract, carnal copulation with the Devil, "that he sucks upon their bodies, that they are transubstantiated into Cats, Dogs, Squirrels . . . or that they raise tempests, and fly in the air."¹⁵⁸

Working entirely through natural means, they may do harm by the imagination, poison, and so on.¹⁵⁹ He defines two classes of witches: "active deceivers,"¹⁶⁰ and those "under a passive delusion" as to their supposed powers and activities.¹⁶¹ Such witches have always existed. But how can sane persons believe in witchcraft? Ignorance and superstition, says Webster: "The ignorance or mistaking of these things, joyned with the notions Men have imbibed from their infancy, together with irreligious education, are the true and proper causes"¹⁶² It is the Book of Nature--here speaks Webster the Baconian--which will show men the true causes of many strange things which seem supernatural. With so much to learn of Nature's boundaries, "no Man can rationally assign a beginning for supernatural agents and actions, that does not certainly know when the power and operation of nature ends."¹⁶³ Man's marvelous ignorance of Nature "is most evident in those many elucubrations, and continued discoveries of those learned and indefatigable persons that are of the Royal Society, which do plainly evince that hitherto we have been ignorant of almost all the true causes of things, and therefore through blindness have usually attributed those things to the operation of Cacodemons that were truly wrought by nature, and thereby not small augmented this gross and absurd opinion of the power of Witches."¹⁶⁴

Du Moulin's translation of The Divell of Mascon had achieved some celebrity, to judge from Webster (the translation reached its fifth edition two years later, in 1679). It is twice given a fairly extended mention in the Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft. Webster does not classify it as witchcraft literature--which indeed it is not, though it has the same purpose. The puckish, sometimes wistful behavior of the "witty Devil" apparently cast a spell even upon the blunt Webster, for he declares:

And whosoever shall seriously read and consider that little Piece that was printed some few years since, though written long ago, and by some (that pretend to no small share of Learning) cryed up exceedingly for a most convincing Relation, to prove the Existence of Spirits, called, The Devil of Mascon, may easily gather, that if the thing were truly related, as to the matter of fact, that it must needs be some Creature of a middle Nature, and no evil Spirit, both because it was such a sportful and mannerly Creature, that it would leave them, and not disturb them at their devotions; as also (as far as I remember, for I have not the Book by me) because it denied that it was a Devil, and professed that it hoped to be saved by Christ.¹⁶⁵

And again, after reviewing the book's auspices--"translated by D^r Peter Du Moulin, at the request of the honourable and learned person M^r Boyle"--Webster remarks that

The Character given of this Author, and the assent of such learned persons to the things related, have gained an ample suffrage to give them credit also. But notwithstanding all this, there are many passages in the relation that a quick-sighted Critick would find to be either contradictory or inconsistent, and it cannot rationally be thought that he was a Cacodemon, his actions were so harmless, civil, and ludicrous; and if he were to be believed . . . he was no Devil, but hoped to be saved by Jesus Christ. But whether a Devil or not, yet the story for substance doth sufficiently prove the existence of such kind of Demons, that can work strange and odd feats.¹⁶⁶

Despite his often modern turn of thought, Webster obviously looked to the past also. It was largely in reply to Webster's Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft that Dr. Henry More published the posthumous edition of Glanvill's magnum opus on witchcraft, Sadducismus Triumphatus (1681). But even as the book appeared, the more rational followers of witchcraft were disbanding, and the malevolent hags Glanvill defended had most of them flown over the horizon, henceforth to persist only as folk feeling or a shadowy element in the works of Hawthorne.¹⁶⁷

CHAPTER V

POLYHYMNIA AND PRACTICALITY

As with the Restoration it moved through the Janus gate to the future, England often felt alarm as the old issues of religion and politics showed a semblance of life. But since Enthusiasm had gasped its last with the Stuarts' return, only the Catholic threat remained. If the Papacy no longer hoped to extirpate established Protestantism, the zeal of the Jesuits even after the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) kept Europe in a turmoil by furthering the ambition of Louis XIV. Though most English Catholics merely wanted to be let alone, the Stuart intrigues to restore the Roman faith, often sensed uneasily by the people rather than clearly perceived, indirectly promoted hysteria over the Popish Threat. While Atheism stalked the darkling plain as witch bands obscured the stars, the Babylonian woe still sent men to the shambles of Tyburn. The similar political theories of the left-wing Puritans and of Bellarmine and Mariana had long since created suspicions that the Jesuits had helped to martyr Charles I. Flirtatious in religion as in other things, his son Charles II first importuned Rome in 1662-1663; and by secret treaties, open diplomacy, and advancement of Catholics to key positions, he created an atmosphere wanting only a spark for an explosion.¹ The spark came in the testimony of the habitual liar Titus Oates, and the madness called the Popish Plot kept the scaffold drenched with the blood of innocent men, Jesuits and others, from November, 1678, to the middle of 1679. Like his father, Peter Du Moulin was a controversialist, and as he busied one hand with the quarrels over science and witchcraft, he dipped the other into the holy war of books concerning Catholic political activities.

His entry into this dispute began with his reply to a tract entitled Philanax Anglicus; or, A Christian caveat for all kings, princes, and prelates, published anonymously in London in 1663 by Sir Henry Janson. Du Moulin's reply was A Vindication of the Sincerity of the Protestant Religion in the Point of Obedience to Sovereignes. Opposed to the Doctrine of Rebellion, authorised and practised by the Pope and the Jesuites. In Answer to a Jesuitical Libel, Entituled Philanax Anglicus . . . (London, 1664). Following second and third editions in 1667 and 1668, Du Moulin published a fourth edition in 1679 in which, according to the title page, "more light is given about the horrible POPIISH PLOT, whereby our late Sacred Sovereign Charles the I. was Murdered." Professing horror at the Puritan rebellion and the late King's execution, Philanax Anglicus had sought to discredit Protestantism by attributing revolutionary doctrines to it, and by denouncing the Independents who had brought the King to trial.² Such a denunciation was maladroit, for Du Moulin pointed out, as others have done since, that the political theories by which the Independents justified their deed had been taken from such Jesuits as Bellarmine and Mariana.³ Reading his book, one is returned to the days when the elder Du Moulin had striven mightily against Cardinal Bellarmine and the Cardinal Du Perron. "With what face or conscience can the Jesuites pass a hard Sentence upon the late Rebels and King-killers," Du Moulin asks,

"seeing that these furious Zealots have neither taught nor done any thing in that horrible defection, but what they had learned of the Jesuites?"⁴ The Puritans got from Bellarmine, according to Du Moulin, the teaching that political power originates with the people, who therefore may alter the government.⁵ What of the "High Court of Justice" which Parliament erected to try Charles I? The Independents borrowed this from Mariana's De Rege et Regis Institutione, he points out. The doctrine of the people's right to depose a king as a tyrant and kill him, Du Moulin continues, the Puritans found in Lessius and Suarez.⁶ But even if the Puritans had learned this much from the Jesuits, Du Moulin promised his Catholic foes, "how far you are yet before them, I will shew before I have done with you."⁷

Du Moulin kept his promise. He charged that, with the express approval of the Sorbonne and the Holy See, Jesuits had infiltrated Cromwell's army, disguised as Independents, and had actively conspired for the execution of King Charles.⁸ Sent by their party in England, he asserted, a group of Jesuits had put in writing first to the faculty of the Sorbonne and then to the Pope and his council the question "That seeing the State of England was in a likely posture to change Government, whether it was lawful for the Catholicks to work that change, for the advancing and securing of the Catholick Cause in England, by making away the King, whom there was no hope to turn from his Heresie?"⁹ Gaining approval, according to Du Moulin, a great party of Jesuits came to England to work for the King's downfall, principally in the Army.¹⁰ When the execution of Charles was subsequently assailed as an heinous crime, Du Moulin wrote, "the Pope commanded all the papers about that question to be gathered and burnt"; but "a Roman Catholick in Paris" refused to give up his copy and divulged the contents to a Protestant friend.¹¹

When Du Moulin published the charge in the first edition of his Vindication, "it strook such a terror among the Gentlemen of Sommerset-House (where a man of great note was much concerned in it) that they cast themselves at the Kings feet to crave Justice against me" on the pretext of an incident related by Du Moulin in which a priest rejoiced in the late King's execution.¹² The clamor was soon hushed, he continued, but the group got the Queen Mother to persuade the King that Du Moulin should write no more books of such nature. Owing a debt of gratitude to Du Moulin's writings, Charles II was in an awkward position, and resolved the problem by asking Du Moulin, through the Secretary of State Sir William Morrice, to abstain from writing books in English "because it was not my Natural Language."¹³ The prohibition was removed, a marginal note in the 1679 edition points out, when the 1668 edition appeared.¹⁴ There were several replies to the Vindication, principally one by the young Earl of Castlemaine entitled The Catholique Apology . . . together with a clear refutation of . . . Dr. Du Moulin's Answer to Philanax . . . (London, 1674). In its third edition (also 1674), Castlemaine's book challenged Du Moulin to prove his charges, since he had "been defied by Papists, & solicited by Protestants" to do so.¹⁵ Jeering at his opponent as "the Sieur du Moulin," Castlemaine scored a hit in observing that when Du Moulin should be called on for proofs, "you'll be still as tenacious as an Ussurer, & part with none of them, unlesse the summons issues from Authority, though, you know, we come not at all to Court."¹⁶

Du Moulin answered Castlemaine in the fourth edition of his Vindication. "As for my being defied by the Papists," he snapped, "I have defied them now seventeen years to call me in question before our Judges, and so I do still."¹⁷ Protestants, too, "some of them of great Place, have exprest to me a great desire that I should discover the whole Plot."¹⁸ Du Moulin had "set down the whole matter as far as I know, nothing wanting to it but the witnesses," and emphatically stated (in italics) that "This certain intelligence shall be justified whensoever Authority shall require it."¹⁹ Since a "matter of that high nature must not be squabled out between private interested persons, but pondered by those grave men in Power that have the decisive voice," Du Moulin stood by his resolution to give evidence only to authority.²⁰ But some corroboration was now badly needed; it would not do merely to repeat his charges. To prop his case, Du Moulin printed a letter from Secretary of State Morrice, "that Eminent Gentleman in Piety, Learning, and Wisdom . . . now with God." Morrice had relayed the King's command by letter to Du Moulin, but the letter had been mislaid. Du Moulin wrote him on 17 February 1673, and asked the retired official "to send me a confirmation of that passage, and withal some Idea of the behaviour of those Papists at that time."²¹ Replying in the friendliest terms from Wherington on 9 August 1673, Sir William applauded "Your pious Zeal, and good designs . . ." and wished "happy success to Your undertakings with reward proportionable²² He verified Du Moulin's account of the King's command, pointedly avoided any reflection on the Queen Mother, and, if he could not speak of the alleged conspiracy as a proven fact, Morrice admitted that all appearances favored Du Moulin's assertion of papist guilt in the King's murder.²³

Du Moulin had to maintain his position by bold assertion, but what supporting evidence he could have produced is unclear. The seriousness of his charges, especially since the Queen Mother was involved by name, had brought them to the attention of Parliament in 1673, and there was talk of summoning Du Moulin to present his evidence. Apart from the Queen Mother, the redoubtable Sir Kenelm Digby, whom (p. 60) Du Moulin had identified as "a man of great note," was considered the active head of the alleged conspiracy. Because one of the principal witnesses had died, Du Moulin was in a quandary and might be hoist by his own petard. In anxiety, he wrote to Robert Boyle for advice from Canterbury on 1 October 1673:

Mr. Peregrine Bertie, who is a member of the House of Commons, told me, that at their last session a motion was made by Sir Thomas Clarges, that I should be sent for, to justify that, which I have undertaken in my book against Philanax, to make good before authority about a deputation of some Jesuits from their brethren in England to the Sorbonne, and so to Rome, about their design of promoting the late king's death. But that some wise men of the House would not have me sent for, till it was known first what I could say. This put me to a necessity to prepare myself, that I might not be sent for being unready; and I have set down in the paper, that I sent to you, all that I can say. The like I have given to Sir Edward Deering, and may give the like to some other parliament-men, hoping, that seeing all I can say, they will not send for me. You may soon see, that if I had been sent for, when I made this offer, I had convincing proofs. But the main witness being dead since, I cannot convince an adversary, but persuade all equitable judges with the clearness of my evidences. My business is now, and with me of all wise and pious protestants, to look out more intelligences of the papists, in two conjunctures; the one about the time of the king's death, the other in 1663, when my book appeared first; and the mention of that deputation struck an extreme terror into those malefactors, of whom Sir Kenelm Digby was the head. In this important occurrence I do in all humility consult the oracle of your wisdom, and crave the assistance of your love.²⁴

Boyle's counsel remains unknown. So far as we know, however, Du Moulin was not called before Parliament; evidently the information he had given Sir Edward Deering, even if it tended to show Catholic guilt, was not strong enough to merit a summons. And it apparently was not enough to bring sub rosa action to suppress the book, for the Vindication reached its fourth edition six years later.

As for the accusation of Philanax Anglicus that the doctrine and practice of the Reformed religion was rebellion, Du Moulin took a line of reply which, if not profoundly original, was effective. As he put it,

The Adversary to disgrace our Doctrine, hath objected to us some passages of our Authors, most of them false or wrested, and some actions of persons of the Protestant party. But though he had proved all these to be true, he had done no harm to our Doctrine, which is not built upon private opinions, or upon private or publick actions. He should have taken our Confessions in hand, and Indicted them of rebellious Tenets, if he could have found any; Or finding none, he should have given glory to God, and confessed the Truth of God with us.²⁵

Du Moulin then presents from eight Reformed confessions of faith, including that of the English Church, articles enjoining the faithful to obey their magistrates.²⁶ Against this, he quotes a long list of papal bulls and decrees²⁷--the citations extend from Gregory I (A.D. 611) to the fiery Paul V, in whose pontificate King James's Oath of Allegiance was debated by Bellarmine and the elder Du Moulin--to show that "the Doctrine of the Roman Court in the point of Obedience to Sovereigns, is a Doctrine of Rebellion."²⁸ Du Moulin backs up this accusation with a lengthy review of Jesuit teachings--by Suarez, Mariana, Bellarmine, and others--and activities, all seeking to show how the Jesuit doctrines of deposition and tyrannicide fomented and furthered rebellion. A bit smugly, he points out that what individual Protestants have said or done toward rebellion, orthodox Protestants may condemn; but the Papist is "sworn to approve all that the Pope saith or doth."²⁹ The truth, as Du Moulin sees it, becomes simple:

The difference between the faults of the Pope and those of Protestants about the point of obedience, is this; That disobedience with us is a crime, but with him it is a Law. We punish rebels, but the Pope rewards them.³⁰

English Catholic attempts to make Protestantism and rebellion synonymous were paralleled by similar propaganda in France; and though Du Moulin had for years thought of himself as an Englishman, he still felt strongly the old religious bond between the English Church and the French Reformed, however this might cross High-Church pretensions within the Establishment. The campaign by the French Crown, the Jesuits, and the Catholic Church to whittle away the dwindling rights of the Huguenots was accompanied by systematic written attacks, such as that by Paul Hay, the Marquis de Chastelet, entitled Traite de la Politique de France, par Monsieur P.H. Marquis de C. Avec quelques reflexions sur ce traite par le Sr. L'Ormegregny (1669). Depicting the Huguenots as dangerous internal enemies to the French Crown, the book called for their complete suppression. Either because he had betrayed designs of the French ministry or had meddled in high matters of state, the Marquis was thrown into prison.³¹ Du Moulin had written adverse comments upon the book's fourth and fifth chapters under the name of the Sieur L'Ormegegry, and the entire work was translated into English in 1680.³² The "Reflections upon the Fifth Chapter of the Politicks of France, Which Treats of the Huguenots," is especially similar to the arguments of the Vindication. In this section, Du Moulin depicts the Huguenots as the real friends of the French crown because of their official doctrines of obedience and Divine Right, as opposed to Jesuit claims of the Pope's temporal jurisdiction.³³ The attitudes of the Jesuits and the French Reformed are sharply contrasted.³⁴ In the section entitled "Reflections upon the Roman Clergy," Du Moulin challenges papal claims of temporal jurisdiction, attacks the Jesuits as fomenters of regicide, opposes the channeling of French revenues into Italy, and tries to persuade Louis XIV to limit the powers of the Catholic Church.³⁵ In order to show the loyalist sentiment of the Huguenots, Du Moulin quotes (in the English translation) the letter written by his father in 1621 enjoining obedience upon the mutinous Assembly of La Rochelle;³⁶ the text is identical with that quoted in various editions of the Vindication.³⁷

His years in England and his loyalty to the Anglican Church had not weakened Du Moulin's awareness of the community of Protestant religious interests. He was deeply distressed at the plight of the Huguenots, and as "a moderate episcopal man" he wrote to Boyle from Canterbury on 3 July 1671 that

The truth is, Sir, I am stung with a jealousy of God, at the pride, insolence, and uncharitableness of our men of preferment, that unchurch our churches [the Continental Reformed]; and I intend (God assisting me with his grace) to take occasion of these miseries of our brethren, to make them (for others, that are better Christians than they) sensible how criminal before God and man is their insultation.³⁸

Though Du Moulin was a man of practicality, his sincerity in these bitter debates seems unquestionable, and is consistent with his other writings and activities for Crown and Church. Broadly speaking, he transplanted the ideas of his father, with all their strength and limitations and pragmatism, to English soil. As he came to think and feel as an Englishman within the comprehensive Establishment, his ideas completely lost their alien tinge. This process demonstrated one of the great strengths of the communal bond of Protestant humanism, of which he and his great opponent John Milton were equally parts.

Seen in the context of his times, Du Moulin is primarily a practical divine who engages in polemics as circumstances arise; but there are other parts of his work which deserve mention. One of these is his neo-Latin poetry. Much of this verse is good enough, or biographically important enough to deserve some inspection. Any critical estimate of poetry or verse is, of course, ultimately perhaps a matter of taste, and doubtless a poet is entitled to choose his subject matter.

But he also incurs its consequences. Because of the often heavy religiosity and acrimonious tone with which Du Moulin writes, the corpus of his Latin poetry is not likely to be revived because of its literary interest. His undeniable talent, to be straightforward about it, was blighted by Calvinism and preaching. The limitations of his viewpoint we can gather from his statements about Charron quoted earlier, where all philosophy and learning are made subservient to theology, particularly moral theology. Where Du Moulin's creative talent was concerned, this was (to echo a contemporary) to hang weights on the wings of the wind, and it often made his Pegasus merely a hobby-horse.

Du Moulin's verse was collected in ΠΑΡΕΠΤΑ, which we have mentioned already. In its final edition (1671), the volume was made up of four sections, and fitted with a general dedication to Robert Boyle.³⁹ Book One was a series of hymns on the Apostles' Creed; Book Two (Ecclesiae Gemitus, or "The Groans of the Church") a tearfully angry picture of the Church under Puritan oppression; Book Three a miscellany (Sylva Variorum); and the last section the Incrementum which Du Moulin slipped past the Cambridge licensors. The first book is dedicated to his distinguished relative, Samuel Bochart;⁴⁰ the second to his close friend Meric Casaubon; the third one to Thomas Fotherby, an associate at Canterbury; and Incrementum is without dedication. Only the most devout could relish the piety of the Hymni XIII in Symbolum Apostolorum, whereas the angry lamentations of Ecclesiae Gemitus have long since died away. His other verse, however, has considerable interest and, aside from some of a varied description, may be considered as autobiographical, political, and familiar.

There are three poems of obvious biographical interest. One, Deo Liberatori Sacrum (III, 52 ff.), gives a dramatic account of Du Moulin's escape on 22 December 1624 from prison in Dunkirk, then in Spanish hands, and his flight on horseback to France.⁴¹ In another poem (III, 56 ff.) Quid retribuam Domino?, the incident is recalled as Du Moulin thankfully views his deliverance from danger in the period of Puritan domination. Dated 1665, the poem Senectuti gratulatur (III, 84-85) reveals what must have been Du Moulin's prevailing cheerful disposition, as at sixty-four he happily contemplates the joys which mature years can bring. It also treats a favorite theme of his, peace and contentment of mind.

Passing by the turgid, bloodthirsty invective of the four poems making up Ecclesiae Gemitus--for which Du Moulin apologises in his preface⁴²--one comes to a group of political poems. If not delectable for matter and style, they have an historical interest as they compare with Du Moulin's book against Milton and the Regicides, Regii Sanguinis Clamor. They were in fact arranged in ΠΑΡΕΠΤΑ according to common subject matter: the execution of Charles I, the literary war over the murder, the plight of England under the Puritans, and her deliverance at the Restoration. An undated poem, Magni Manes Caroli Primi Regis & Martyris (II, 30 ff.) fetches up the slain King's ghost, who awakens Du Moulin from slumber and, by turns indignant and compassionate, mourns England's sad condition under the Puritan tyranny. As Du Moulin seeks to awaken sympathy for the Royal Martyr, the poem becomes somewhat grisly in describing how the decapitated Royal head wobbles because poorly fastened:

Pallor in ore sacro, macies, cava lumina, torvus
 Aspectus, cervix caesa & male sarta, vacillans
 Vix caput attollens, delabentemque coronam.
 Jusserat impexos sanies concrescere crines
 Et crudo horrendum stillabat sanguine barba.

Even Lucan would have had difficulty in surpassing this. Linked with it are two other poems. One, In Zelotas rebelles (II, 43-44), is dated 1643, and inveighs against the fiery zeal of the Puritans lately sent forth from Hell to defile the Church, fill the Universities with insane rant, and, with hypocritical promises of liberty, to incite the fickle mob to criminal rebellion against the King. Because of a comparison of Charles I to Christ, the poem was apparently touched up after 1643 to suit the Royal martyrdom. In lines to Nobilissimo Puero (II, 48), dated 1649, Du Moulin urges a youth of the highest birth--perhaps the Prince of Wales--to flee to the French court and a sure welcome by Louis XIV in view of the disasters raining down on England. Both imaginative and bitterly clever is the monologue Terrae Gemitus (II, 73), in which Mother Earth objects in agony to the incredible monsters she has just had to spawn--the King-killing Puritans. Perhaps its equal is the dramatic monologue Tyrannus (the speaker is Cromwell) in Angliae Servitus Rege Emulante (Incrementum, 31). Here the Lord Protector is shrewdly portrayed as a psychological cross between Machiavelli and a debauched Roman emperor, a magnificently unprincipled villain who has subdued land and sea, become the Patron of the fervently hypocritical Puritan saints, corrupted Royalist supporters with gold, and now wishes to numb his conscience with wine, women, and song. He is followed by the abject Populus (Incr., 34-35), which rather pathetically prays for deliverance from the miseries of Puritan rule. As a foil to "England's Slavery during the King's Exile," in Angliae Libertas Rege Redeunte (Incr., 36-39), Psalms 124 and 126 are turned to account to show the blessings conferred upon England by the return of Charles II.

The acrid verse which comprises so much of Du Moulin's output is offset by a cluster of poems having, in comparison to his polemics, a charm which is surprising. Limited in range by Du Moulin's religious orientation, the poems are at their best when he has a chance for natural description. His usual theme is Calvinistic, the discovery of God in the beauty and wonder of his creation. And yet, from the spontaneity and freshness of his writing, it is clear that Du Moulin had an almost Romantic feeling for nature, which, if his talent had not been almost stifled by an imposed religious system, might have produced really significant poetry showing a kinship with such Picturesque writers as Gilpin and the English pre-Romantics. Perhaps a good compendium of the subjects found in this descriptive poetry is found in Naturae Pannum (III, 7)—cool shades from the hot sun, dewy grass, the starry heavens, and (ll. 9-10)

In Coelumque minantium

Scabrorum scopulorum horror amabilis

To obtain a fair view of Du Moulin's talent and feeling for nature poetry, we must consider, besides the short Naturae Fama, the longer poems Spectacula Coeli (III, 92-93), Quantum est quod nescimus (III, 90 ff.), as well as two descriptive sketches he wrote as a young man in a conscious prose-poetry--Schola Naturae (III, 143-146) and Villa Cambrica (III, 147-149). The concept of Nature as the Temple of God--in the beauties of which the spectator beholds the power, wisdom, and majesty of the Creator and perceives how he is a link in the golden chain joining Heaven to Earth--is given its fullest statement in Schola Naturae. Du Moulin put his best youthful eloquence into this rhapsody on Nature as a teacher. It is, however, in his realistic and sympathetic description of rugged Welsh mountain country in Villa Cambrica that Du Moulin finds one of his most congenial subjects. His picture of the jagged peaks, or animals' difficulty in feeding there, or a mountain torrent pelting through its carved rock bed, or a large, sinister cave--these, a topographical poet could scarcely have bettered. The fine effect of the sketch is paralleled by a similar description in a Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind.⁴³ Celestial phenomena also fascinated Du Moulin, and he was able to transmute certain passages from Calvin's Institutes⁴⁴ into poems which convey a genuine wonder at the beauty and order of the Heavens. Spectacula Coeli is a picture of night descending on a sunset sky brilliant with colors; and if, from one standpoint, the final religious reflection could well have been omitted, at least it brings the poem to a quiet close appropriate to the settling twilight. The title of Quantum est quod nescimus is sufficient clue to its moral, didactic character, but the treatment is, on the whole, successful. As ignorant man considers the colorful brilliancy of the stars moving on their courses, the ruddy tails of plunging comets, and the natural law which governs other worlds, he falls prostrate before the Great Architect. Because the point of the work is implicit throughout, Quantum est achieves unity. Some imaginative power is also shown in Aula Scannium, where Du Moulin dreams that he is offered a kingship and out of courtesy accepts it, making his own abdication--in the interests of virtue, of course--his first and last official act. Humor and geniality mark his brief poem De Tabaco (III, 134-135), wherein his moral is wryly turned:

Nempe Dei speculum mentem purgare laborans,
Si studeam cerebrum scopis everrere pasti,
Quid nisi faece novâ detergere tentem?

There is considerably less general interest in the two other groups of poems by Du Moulin, those addressed to members of the Boyle family, and those to his friends and associates at Canterbury. Of the five pieces comprising the Boyle group, two are exceptions to the eulogistic tone of the rest.⁴⁵ They are an extensive epitaph (III, 121) for his former student Richard Boyle, killed on 3 June 1665 by a cannon ball while shielding the Duke of York during a naval battle in the Second Dutch

War; and a following epigram (III, 122) also to Richard Boyle. They are dignified by a sincere and restrained grief. Du Moulin's "Canterbury" poems, on the other hand, are valuable chiefly as they show the extent and cordial relationship he had at Christ Church with such ecclesiastics as Archbishop Juxon, Meric Casaubon, Thomas Fotherby, William Barker, John Castilion, and Peter Gunning.¹⁶ Perhaps the most unsuccessful poem in the group is the Epicedium to Archbishop Juxon (III, 128-130), which connects with Du Moulin's account of the prelate in Clamor ad Coelum. Though it touchingly recalls the good old man's sufferings under the Puritan regime, the Epicedium as poetry is weakened by a comparison of the doddering Archbishop to Atlas. There is, however, a feeling of deep personal concern in Du Moulin's consolatory poem to Meric Casaubon, Schola Morbi (III, 11-13). It was evidently written when long illness had plainly shown that death was nearing for the aging scholar. The poem's close is marked by a stoic fortitude:

Vir Magne, cujus plurimis exercita
 Morbi & laborum fortitudo praeliis,
 Suam approbavit Imperatori fidem;
 O perge quidquid est super certaminis
 Certare: perfer hoc tibi incumbens onus:
 Precare, spera, fide, sancte pertinax.
 Perennitati praeivum lactissimae
 Acerbitatis omne tempus est breve.

Of Du Moulin's Latin verse, it may be said that often his fresher poems were designed as exempla to point a moral. Despite his great competence at writing in a difficult medium, he formulated no critical statement and had no real esthetic theory. He had, nonetheless, clear-cut ideas about the scope and amount of poetry one should write: not too much in quantity, and edifying in character.⁴⁷ He was distrustful of more warmly passionate, more delightful poetry, for it might weaken the moral fiber. And yet he enjoyed poetry. As a Calvinistic divine, he could not escape the constrictions of godliness and utility. But in those moments when Du Moulin's imagination is kindled by the starry sky, or he feels a thrill of romantic pleasure at a wild mountain prospect, we wish that his very real poetic talent had not been so nearly smothered by a surplice made in Geneva.

If the range and artistry of Du Moulin's creative work are unfortunately curtailed by such purposes as edification or propaganda, the practical aspect of his life as a clergyman illuminates facets of life in the Restoration which are easily overlooked among the Popish alarms, slippery diplomacy, or intellectual swordplay of the period. The anger at property damage which so prominently marks, or mars, the verse of Ecclesiae Gemitus and page after page of Clamor ad Coelum draws little or no sympathy from the modern reader. And yet the wreckage and disfigurement of church buildings during the Wars, the mistreatment of the Anglican clergy, the siphoning of Church revenues and spoliation of its libraries and treasure were left to the English people at the Restoration as scarred monuments to the subversive fanaticism of the Puritans. The bigotry and destructive emotionalism of the Puritans at their worst were nowhere better seen. Hardened by what it had suffered during the Wars, the restored Anglican Church made iron-clad conformity the rule, with unhappy effects upon the Church's relations with European Protestantism. Aside from such domestic legislation as the Clarendon Code, this attitude resulted in a stress upon Anglican reordination of foreign clergymen seeking either incorporation into the Church or use of its facilities, and in a demand that foreign congregations in England conform to the liturgy of the Established Church. This struck at the community feeling between the Anglican and Reformed Churches which Peter Du Moulin had repeatedly emphasized, and it grew from elements perceptible in his father's correspondence with Bishop Andrewes fifty years before. Beside his duties of preaching, Peter Du Moulin in his Canterbury years was concerned with the problems of the Cathedral's restoration and of the foreign congregation worshipping there.

As canons of Christ Church, both Du Moulin and Meric Casaubon figured in a quarrel in 1661 between factions of the Walloon Church, a Huguenot refugee congregation which met in the crypt of Canterbury Cathedral. The disagreement had begun in 1657 under the Protectorate when one group tried, in opposition to the consistory, to force the election of Paul Jannon as their minister. The group's failure and withdrawal were temporarily healed by a reconciliation in 1661, urged by the Mayor and Aldermen at the King's orders, and the congregation united with Jannon as one of its ministers. But several months later, there was a fresh breach when Jannon tried to bring in John Stecker, a Swiss (and later rector of St. Alphege, 1663-1709), to be one of the pastors. Jannon and his party, in order to have their way, offered to conform to the Anglican liturgy, and accordingly the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral procured a Royal order for the faction to be put in possession of the crypt.⁴⁸ Among the signers of the notice (13 July 1661) to the King from the Dean and Chapter were Casaubon and Du Moulin.⁴⁹ Including the greater number of substantial citizens headed by the Rev. Philippe le Keux, the remaining group of the Walloon Church could not promise to conform. Because of their exclusion, they were forced in October, 1661, to find another place to hold their services. But after the French Church of London interceded with Du Moulin and Casaubon to use their influence as canons of Christ Church, the group's position was improved, for Le Keux was permitted to preach in the crypt on Sunday afternoons. On a fresh appeal of Jannon to the King, however, the Chapter now received the Royal command to exclude the non-conforming Huguenots. Still further maneuvering saw the reinstatement of the original congregation (that headed by Le Keux) and the confirmation of their privileges by an order of the King in Council dated 14 November 1662--which has been, in effect, the charter of this church ever since.⁵⁰

The Anglican Church had indeed been sadly abused by the Puritans. If Du Moulin's long, bitter denunciations of this in Ecclesiae Gemitus and Regii Sanguinis Clamor seem exaggerated, the facts are almost as grim. When the Anglican clergy returned to their great churches at the Restoration, they found them--particularly Canterbury and Rochester Cathedrals--almost in ruins. Having little veneration for the beauty of holiness, the Puritan saints had used their opportunities. Especially at Canterbury, costly stained-glass windows had been broken, roofs impaired, priceless ornaments stripped of their precious metals, tombs of the dead abused and defaced, and the libraries of deans and chapters sold. Through lack of repairs, the houses of the clergy had become dilapidated, and seals and records were lost and hopelessly dispersed.⁵¹ One document drawn up by the Canterbury staff in 1662 says that the Cathedral looked "more like a ruined Monastery than a Church; so little had the fury of the late Reformers left remaining of it beside the bare walls and roofs"⁵² After listing the appalling details of Puritan vandalism, it continues:

generally, whatever was money-worth made prize of and imbesilled; and in fine, a goodly brave Cathedral become no better (in respect of those who got it and kept possession of it) than a Den of thieves and plunderers; and to make the better way for such invaders to abuse it, the Churches guardians, her faire and strong Gates, betimes turned off the hooks and burned.⁵³

The repairs, together with "other public and pious uses, since our Restauration" necessitated the spending of upwards of £10,000 by Dean and Chapter by 1662.⁵⁴ As the text of the document makes clear, the returned Anglican clergy were being severely criticized by disgruntled

Puritans, "the black and slanderous mouths of the professed enemies of us and that prosperity which, after many years of adversity and suffering, we now enjoy" ⁵⁵ It was necessary to refute this "false as fowle aspersion and calumny" that Church revenues were going "into our owne private barnes and baggs, without due regard either of our Church, the Poore, the Publick, or Posterity" ⁵⁶ As the Puritan criticism grew, Du Moulin defended in print one source of revenue the use of which the Puritans had denounced--church fines. His answer was A Letter to a Person of Quality Concerning the Fines Received by the Church at Its Restoration. Wherein, By the instance of One of the Richest Cathedrals a very fair guess may be made at the Receipts and Disbursements of All the Rest . . . (London, 1668). He had to show that the capitular clergy deserved what they got, that individual receipts were not excessive, and that money had been spent on the Cathedral itself in the proper spirit. The clergy he praised as persons that had lost their Estates for his [Charles II's] glorious Fathers service; Couragious Holy men, who by their unwearied labours and the authority of their Piety, had kept the most part of the English subjects in their duty to God and the King, against the prevalency of the reigning Rebellion. Many of them [---like Du Moulin---] had fought with their Pens against the usurping Powers, to the great danger of their lives; which to save, they lived either in exile abroad, or shifting from place to place in the three Kingdoms.

If after their long tugging against the Tyranny, they were rewarded by their long desired Sovereign with some of the Churches goods, those goods were set in their proper place, and cannot but injuriously be said to be thrown upon such men undeservedly.⁵⁷

How much did the clergy receive? The church fines collected covered nearly twenty years of Puritan domination, and, Du Moulin stated, after deducting for reparation of the Cathedral and a present to the King, the sum came to about £1100 for each of the canons.⁵⁸ But as he pointed out, "this Proportion did hardly amount to the third part of my losse, by Sequestration and other violences of the War The condition of my Bretheren cannot be much different from mine."⁵⁹ As a preacher of recognised ability, Du Moulin was chosen to deliver the funeral sermon for Dr. Thomas Turner, Dean of the Cathedral, on 17 October 1672.⁶⁰ Dr. Turner had taken an active part in restoring the battered Cathedral to its ancient grandeur, and in praising him Du Moulin recalled that

He was most zealously promoting and upholding the publick worship of God in the beauty of holiness, and decent splendor in the house of God, advancing the good of the place wheresoever he presided, what ever toil or censure or money it cost him. Of which he hath given magnificent memorials to our Church and Library.⁶¹

At last, with the strife of the Civil Wars ended, Peter Du Moulin was finding a peace and contentment of mind not merely philosophical or religious, but one that included the good things of life also. He was well known in the intellectual milieu of the Restoration, intimately connected with the great or near-great, a poet, a preacher, and a disputant of recognized importance. As a chaplain-in-ordinary to the King and a canon of England's chief metro-political church, he had become a man of note in ecclesiastical affairs. And as the work of restoring the great Cathedral advanced, he found himself in a personally congenial circle of prominent churchmen. Enjoying an income from Christ Church and revenues from Llanarmon and Adisham, he was well off.

Because of his prosperity, he was able financially to help his brother Dr. Lewis Du Moulin, who had fallen upon evil times since the Restoration. Ejected from the Camden professorship of history at Oxford, Lewis Du Moulin was leading the melancholy life of a threadbare Nonconformist pamphleteer, turning out works against divines of the Established Church, the Puritan rationalist Richard Baxter, and the Papacy. As he lost his sense of proportion, he became a pathetic, naive mystagogue whose occasionally bizarre works delved into eschatology or aired family linen in public.⁶² As Peter Du Moulin vindicated the Anglican Church of Puritan charges of luxury and repelled the Popish Threat, his brother Lewis accused the Establishment of fond glances toward Rome. His charges were contained in A Short and True Account of the Several Advances the Church of England Hath made towards

Rome: Or, a Model of the Grounds upon which the Papists . . . have built their Hopes and Expectations that England would ere long return to Popery . . . (London, 1680). In large part, the book was based upon the Puritan mythos and merely reiterated stock attacks upon ritualism and the suppression of Nonconformists; but it has more interest as it outlines, in pamphlets bound up with it, the personalities and relationship between the Du Moulin brothers. Lewis Du Moulin left little doubt where he stood as to religious beliefs:

As I believe that the Religion of Rome is a pure blindness, and ignorance of understanding, and that of the Church of England an one-eyed Reformation; but the Religion of the Puritans, that of the clear-sighted, which neither wants eyes, nor illumination; I had rather be one eyed in the Communion of the Church of England, than be blind in that of Rome; but otherwise I had rather have two good eyes in the Communion either of the Puritans, or that of our Churches in France, than have but one Eye in that of the Church of England. Yet I believe, that the spirit of Persecution, which stirs up the Bishops of England against those who are Protestants with themselves, makes them incomparable more criminal than it does the Papists against the Reformed, whom they look upon as Hereticks and Apostates, and therefore upon that consideration to treat them as they do.⁶³

Though Lewis Du Moulin angered his elder brother with such inflammatory statements, they agreed upon one point: they objected strenuously to breaking semi-organic ties with foreign Reformed Churches, a point on which Peter Du Moulin had corresponded with Boyle. Lewis Du Moulin criticized assistance by High-Churchmen to Rome

. . . in not acknowledging any other Protestants in the world besides themselves; in discarding all the Reformed Churches beyond Sea, out of the Catalogue of the true Churches of Jesus Christ; in making void all manner of Ordination, but that which is Episcopal, and consequently that of Papists, and their adherents; in putting Calvin the first Author of their Reformation in England, Scotland, and Ireland among the chief of Rebels and Fanaticks⁶⁴

But however firmly both might subscribe to this criticism, Peter Du Moulin had become almost estranged from Lewis Du Moulin because of the nonconformist's repeated attacks on the Establishment. The awkward situation is revealed in a pamphlet bound with A Short and True Account, entitled A True Report of a Discourse between Monsieur De L'Angle, Canon of Canterbury, and Minister of the French Church in the Savoy, and Lewis Du Moulin; The 10th of February, 1678/9 (London, 1679).

A near kinsman of the Du Moulins,⁶⁵ Canon Samuel De L'Angle had visited Lewis Du Moulin to protest his attacks upon the Church and to urge his repentance.⁶⁶ Vexed by Lewis Du Moulin's charges, Dr. Peter Du Moulin had written to De L'Angle "I consider my poor Brother as a man raised by the evil Spirit, for the destruction of the Church; It would be a double fault in me to assist him to do evil."⁶⁷ Lewis Du Moulin was now partly dependent upon his brother for subsistence, but in his anger Peter Du Moulin may have reduced the financial aid. Through Canon De L'Angle, Lewis Du Moulin was informed of "the good intentions that my Elder Brother had to bestow upon me his liberalities," but that "the diminution of my Brothers bounty to me, proceeded from that Emity which I testified with so much heat and bitterness against the Church of England"⁶⁸ Peter Du Moulin, Dr. Lewis Du Moulin felt, had acquired "violent prejudices . . . against me,"⁶⁹ and was ashamed at the revelation that he had urged his brother to repent.⁷⁰ But, adds Lewis Du Moulin, "that which grates upon him, and touches him to the quick, is not the sence that he has done ill in exhorting a person to repent of those crimes, but in not being able to verifie them."⁷¹ Uncomplaining of his own lowly state, Lewis Du Moulin attributed "that bitterness of his toward me, not to his natural temper, which is meek and humble, and full of benignity, but to the great distance which he imagines to be between his Fortune and mine, and to that high place of preferment where he now is."⁷² Paying a compliment to Peter Du Moulin's Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind, Dr. Lewis Du Moulin hoped for a reconciliation and that his brother would see the "good Spirit" which really animated him, and therefore perhaps even join the Puritans by publishing "his meditations against his false Bretheren" the High-Church divines.⁷³ Peter Du Moulin, it will be recalled, had written as "a moderate episcopal man" to Boyle of his intent to counter those who would unchurch Reformed Churches. With a pitiful hopefulness, Lewis

Du Moulin describes his Canterbury brother as one who so happily treads in the steps of his Father, as to what respects the purity of his Doctrine, the exactness of his life, and who possesses, like him, a peace and tranquillity of soul so great, that he is the only person capable to write such a thing from his own experience⁷⁴

It is provocative to speculate whether, for so slight a cause, Peter Du Moulin withdrew financial aid from his unfortunate brother. In Lewis Du Moulin's attitude of brotherly love there is a note of piercing anguish which makes one prefer to believe, whatever De L'Angle said, that Peter Du Moulin did not act so coldly, and that he merely threatened such action to bring around his Nonconforming brother. For Lewis Du Moulin repeats his brother's remark to De L'Angle about evil inspiration "not out of any ill will, to complain of my Brother, but to advance and extol his kindnesses to me, which are so much the greater, and more obliging, in that he Acts quite contrary to what he threatens me with."⁷⁵ Whether the quarrel was patched up is uncertain, but Lewis Du Moulin was on his way to the grave. Even the unhappy man's death was made notorious, for a piece of repentance literature⁷⁶ tells how his last illness began toward the end of September, 1680, and with relentless satisfaction gives full details of his recantation.⁷⁷ Wishing to die in charity with all men, Lewis Du Moulin requested a visit by Dr. Gilbert Burnet,⁷⁸ and thereafter his sick-chamber was a resort for Anglican divines who alternated prayers for

Du Moulin with pressure for him to "do something for the repairing the injuries he had done, in as publick a manner as they were committed."⁷⁹ Upon the urging of the clergymen, the dying man with a good will signed a retraction, dated October 15 and October 17, of whatever personal reflections he had made in his polemics. Lewis Du Moulin knew humility and, entreating their kindness, endured the clergymen who hovered around his death-bed awaiting the retraction. When the pitiful document was made and copies signed, the clergy still were not content.⁸⁰ After his death on October 20 at Westminster, the funeral was held at St. Paul's, Covent Garden, with the Dean of Peterborough, Dr. Patrick, officiating.⁸¹ Perhaps the best description of Lewis Du Moulin is the gracious one of his veteran opponent Richard Baxter: "a sincere honest-hearted man . . . apt to take verbal controversies for real."⁸²

There was not a great deal left for Dr. Peter Du Moulin to do. His brothers Lewis and Cyrus were dead,⁸³ and a nephew also named Peter Du Moulin had, after a strange career which involved him in secret Anglo-Dutch diplomacy, died in 1676.⁸⁴ His close friend Meric Casaubon was thirteen years in his grave. Du Moulin published several more works and despite his age continued his duties at Canterbury.⁸⁵ In the course of a long life he had, like his father, known danger and enjoyed renown. Though he had not engaged in high international controversy with such celebrated names as those of Cardinal Bellarmine and the Cardinal Du Perron, he had seen a greater creative writer, John Milton, goaded to fury by his attack in Regii Sanguinis Clamor. If willing to incur danger, by writing a book to aid his King while the Puritan cannon-balls pelted York, he could still stand by and see innocent Alexander More suffer revilement in his stead. He had mingled on friendly terms with the high nobility and intellectual leaders of the time, and was in favor at Court. While ably championing his church, he had rebuffed the advances of the Triple Tyrant and spoken the last word on the dark genius of Puritan enthusiasm. Esteemed as a preacher, he had also achieved distinction as a neo-Latin poet; and in his Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind, he wrote a work enjoyed long after his death and still pleasant to read.⁸⁶ Like his father, he believed in Calvinistic theology and Protestant unity. While accepting old beliefs in witchcraft, he welcomed the utilitarian possibilities of the New Science. Without being at all a systematic philosopher or theologian, he was always spoken of by gifted men with respect. After his death on 10 October 1684, they could have carved upon his burial place in Canterbury Cathedral⁸⁷--echoing the virtue he prized most-- "Here lies a Man of Prudence."

CHAPTER VI

HUMANISM AND THE DIPLOMATIC BALANCE

. . . considente quasi tota Europa, & judicium ferente

When Milton, as if he were an enthusiastic preacher in a toga, addressed in the Defensio Secunda an audience extending from Sweden to Italy, he was aware, in its widest scope, of the humanistic culture with which we have been concerned in Holland, France, and England. Although the English revolution and the execution of Charles were of international interest, it was in France and Holland, where the intellectual picture was colored by migratory scholars and divines, that these events would have their most immediate impact. Holland was evolving uneasily from a republic into a monarchy, and in France there was a perpetual tension between the Huguenots and their Catholic rulers. For years, Protestants and Catholics had debated the rights of subjects to resist their kings. After practising a Calvinistic theory of resistance in the interests of True Religion, the Huguenots turned officially to a doctrine of obedience in order to preserve their dwindling rights. To maintain and extend the Pope's suzerainty, the Jesuits had taught popular sovereignty and the people's right to try, even kill, heretical kings and tyrants. Such Huguenot spokesmen as Pierre Du Moulin had preached the Divine Right of Kings and urged obedience, to demonstrate the loyalty of Protestant subjects. While such Royalists as Dr. Peter Du Moulin fought at every turn to keep intact the bond between the Anglican and Reformed Churches, the seditious Puritans courted the Calvinists of both France and Holland. Among the Dutch, sympathies about the English revolt were divided, but to the Catholic kings of France, the rebellion could only prove the essential treason of Protestantism. What would be its effect upon internal and foreign policy?

Now, if ever, the theory of Divine Right required buttressing. Condemned as a traitor and murderer by Parliament, the late King of England needed exoneration. Called upon for the task was Claude de Saumaise, "the Prince of the Republic of Letters," a Huguenot by origin and resident in Leyden because of his freedom to publish there without Jesuit interference. It was upon Salmasius and his book, and especially upon his friend and associate Alexander More, that Milton trained his heaviest artillery of argument and insult. As worship of Milton has passed into a riper criticism, posterity has given a fairer appraisal to Salmasius, but has not yet made full restitution to More for the opprobrium he suffered from Milton or flippancies from the poet's followers. As we have seen, the seventeenth century was marked by the bitter taste of controversy, especially of irresponsible name-calling by clergymen. Sufficient allowance for this needs to be made in dealing with the Salmasian Controversy. Indeed, sensationalism marked the quarrel from its beginning, because of the dramatic interest of the King's death and the immense reputation of Salmasius.¹ When the book of Salmasius, Defensio Regia Pro Carolo I, appeared in 1649, purchases of it resulted in many editions.² As Cromwell's Latin Secretary, Milton was called upon to answer it with Joannis Miltoni Angli Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio Contra Claudii Anonymi, alias Salmasii, Defensionem Regiam (London, 1651).³ The vogue these books enjoyed was all the greater because of collateral works which, by enhancing sentimental excitement over Charles's murder, whetted the public appetite for learned debate about the issues involved. Bullied at a one-sided trial which set off favorably his regal disdain, and hectoring even at his prayers, King Charles by his piously gallant composure on the scaffold completed the requirements for martyrdom. Reportedly slipped out of prison for quick publication, the Elkon Basiliké ascribed to him cast over his personality, in the book's many translations, an eternal spell of tragic glamor. There hovered over the whole proceeding the strange sense of a ceremony in which each acted his part to a tragic end; there was a sense of destiny; there was even tragic irony--

Charles's immolation was his triumph. The formally dramatic quality of the event was commonly perceived. Though Marvell's An Horatian Ode is our best-known example of this in English, that tragic quality was underscored for its international audience by the Latin Tragicum Theatrum Actorum, & Casuum Tragicorum Londini Publice celebratorum, Quibus Hiberniae Proregi, Episcopo Cantuariensi, ac tandem Regi ipsi, Aliisque vita adempta, & ad Anglicanam Metamorphosin via est aperta (Amsterdam, 1649). Wrongly attributed to Dr. Peter Du Moulin, the Tragicum Theatrum was illustrated with fine engravings, and it gave a full account of the accusations or trials, farewell speeches, and executions of Strafford, Laud, Charles I, the Duke of Hamilton, the Count of Holland, and others, as well as various documents pertaining to these events.⁴ Tersely depicting the events which swept on to a bloody climax upon the scaffold, the Klenchus Motuum nuperorum in Anglia; Simul ac Iuris Regii et Parlamentarii Brevis Enarratio (Lyons, 1649) went through many editions.⁵ George Bate, M.D., had written it in an abrupt Latin style which caught the agitation of the Civil Wars, gave a succinct account of negotiations, and thus built the reader's interest up to the King's death. Such books as this made the event familiar and vivid to the Continental public and, with the added luster of Salmasius's name, assured a wide public for the Defensio Regia.

Quite apart from what Salmasius's professional enemies might have said, the Defensio Regia did not fail the expectations of a philological age. Since the arguments over Divine Right had gone on for some years, there was not much left to say on this score. Salmasius did, however, present a wealth of evidence to support the theory, connected the English rebellion with the great European debates over Jesuit doctrines of deposition and tyrannicide, and drove home the danger of the English precedent for Continental monarchs. He wrote fluently in a Latin which, if it did not attain the fiery ardor of Milton, did reach a level of indignant protest and made an effective case for the Royalists. What the work seems to lack is a philosophic tone, and its length is not offset by an equal energy of pace. It is, nonetheless, a competent discussion of the theory of Divine Right, theory, and justly criticizes Charles's trial. Salmasius was not obtuse. He had vast learning and a keen mind, and detected an adversary's weak spots; but he could not focus his argument quite sharply enough for a classic statement of his viewpoint.

The unique criminality of the King's execution and resulting public horror, its perversion of all law, custom, and justice are set out at length in Chapter I.⁶ As Salmasius remarks, the "Præcipuum hujus operis & defensionis Regiæ caput ac fundamentum est, reges judicari non posse. In hoc etiam veluti cardine tota quæstio vertitur, ut liqueat jure an injuria Rex Magnæ Britanniae a populi sui parte seditiosa & rebelli capitis damnatus sit."⁷ Using the customary arguments for the theory of Divine Right, and the usual medley of supporting texts from Scripture, Antiquity, and national law, Salmasius develops the doctrines of popular obedience and royal accountability to God alone.⁸ What is more relevant to the book's contemporary vitality, however, is the way it related the King's trial to current political fears, and the picture it gave Europe of the execution's dreadful possibilities. This could affect foreign diplomacy toward the fledgling revolutionary government. Concerning the Puritans, Salmasius declared that

Cum tales sint isti Fanatici nebulones in religione, in conversatione, in administratione republicæ, quis non eos patriæ publicos hostes dixerit? Hoc parum est, communes generis humani hostes judicandi sunt. Putes eos tantum regibus infestos esse quos per summum nefas necare ludum habent? Nullus est in orbe Christiano magistratus, nulla in terris potestas, quantumlibet ordinaria, quantumlibet a Deo ordinata, ut omnes quae sunt, inde esse constat, quam non pari odio prosequantur & persequi parati sint, quam non aeque exterminatam omni ope cupiant, quia ubique apud eos eadem imperandi effraenata libido, eadem parendi imperita contumacia.⁹

There was also a call to the kings of Europe, in their own self-interest, to restore Charles II to his ancestral throne and to punish the Regicides who had killed his father. The language of this passage, together with a similar one from the Elkon Basiliké of Charles, foreshadows Du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Glamor ad Coelum and almost certainly provides one of his main themes:

Ad hac, magni Magnae Britanniae Regis sanguis immani scelere perduellium effusus ad ultionem sui vocat omnes Christiani orbis Monarchas ac Principes. Hujus Manibus dignius illi parentare non poterunt, quam si in integrum restituant legitimum beati ac gloriosi martyris haeredem & successorem, solioque paterno eum reddant, inferiis datis, ac mactatis pro victimis ad sepulcrum defuncti sanctissimi regis belluis illis offeratissimis, quae in tanti regis necem conjurarent, tam crudele ausae nefas, ausoque potitae.¹⁰

Like Du Moulin and other English writers, Salmasius, though French, pointedly linked the Jesuits to left-wing Independents because of similar political doctrines of deposition and tyrannicide, and thought the Catholics preferable. "Huic regum sanctitati duae hodie sanctitates in orbe Christiano infestae maximeque infensae reperiuntur," he gibed: "Papalis & Independentalis. Papalis hoc saltem melior quod eos retinet & observat quos sibi addictos esse cognoverit. Independentalis sine discrimine omnes bonos malosque tollit, & nullos suos esse vult."¹¹ As Du Moulin does later, Salmasius rather grudgingly exonerates the English Presbyterians of direct blame for Charles's death, though he sardonically remarks, "In qua malorum serie indissolubili nova in illum facies exorta est, à Presbyterianis ad Independentes, ut à Pilato ad Caiphan traducta ejus captivitate."¹²

In his attempt to discredit the Puritan government, Salmasius developed two points which are especially germane to Du Moulin's later treatment of the subject. These were the military state, backed by brute force, which the Puritans imposed on England, and the questionable nature of the King's trial as reflected in the court's dubious personnel, procedure, and subservience to military power. It is not to our purpose to review or assess Puritan attempts to legitimise their government by stating it in long-recognised political forms.¹³ To Puritan claims of restoring liberty and realising popular government, Salmasius had some caustic answers. Again and again he drove home the fact of their military tyranny. It was a new monster, a "stratocracy," he charged:

Popularis vero status genus penitus aboleverunt quadraginta tyrannorum Consilium eligendo cum summa potestate ad rempublicam administrandam, novum autem & inauditum saeculis prioribus statum instituendo qui Militaris debet appellari. Hanc enim στρατοκρατίαν priscis incognitam vero nomine oportet nuncupari, quae forma hodie in Anglia regiminis per hos inspiratos fanaticos introducta est, non δημοκρατία, non ὀλιγαρχία, quamvis penes plebem absolutam potestatem residere verbo tantum tenus videantur statuuisse.¹⁴

It was in fact, he asserted, a military commonwealth "in qua ne in speciem quidem imaginaria potestas populo relinquitur, sed tota ducibus exercitus asseritur, qui & iudices sunt & reges & quicquid est in regnando summum, vel usque ad tyrannidis specimen & effectum."¹⁵

When attacking the King's trial, Salmasius is concerned with defining political form and with the influence of military power upon the trial's outcome, which first "assur'd the forced Pow'r." Can Charles be defended, he asks, by the law common to Kings, or is there some special law by which he is set apart, having only a name in common with other Kings? The parricides, Salmasius points out, maintain that in form England is a mixed state and that power belongs to Parliament, not to the King. He concedes that the name of King has been given to those not really Kings, and that, on the other hand, many modern rulers have a kingly power but a different name. But what has been the power of the English King, he asks, as it fits historical evidence of a power so defined? The King's majesty is indivisible and he is above Parliament, having the power to summon it whereas it has no such power over him.¹⁶ England is an unmixed monarchy, he continues, since the King has a free hand in religious and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the administration of civil justice, and the management of war and peace. The Kings of England are kings--contrary to the Puritan contentions in Charles's trial--by inheritance, by nature, by the law of God, and the law of the land.¹⁷ The King's conviction is even more a crime in Salmasius's eyes because of those who did it: a miserable, mutilated Parliament which was only the tool of the Army compelling it by force, an Army "Qui Senatui quasi captivo imperat, & cum tyrannicam dominationem in Anglia exerceat, populo tamen persuadere conatur libertatem se illi multo sanguine suo comparasse."¹⁸

From another standpoint, Salmasius challenges the trial as a murderous farce: the court was illegal and its personnel was incompetent.¹⁹ A court without authority was headed by ignorant judges.²⁰ Upon Charles's demand, they could show no real authority,²¹ and the King was denied the usual right in trials for high treason to exclude judges prejudiced against him.²² The court, moreover, was not representative of the people (despite the judges' claim), for though it asserted it had received jurisdiction from the people, they had passed no law empowering it.²³ Indeed, the King was not judged by his peers, Salmasius remarked, but by his feudal vassals.²⁴ Although Charles was denounced as a "tyrant," he points out, the court did not know the meaning of the term.²⁵ As the embodied principle of Majesty, the King cannot be tried for treason;²⁶ and regardless of its ridiculous claims of an elective kingship, the Parliament in this trial did not represent the people--only the Army, a very small fraction of the people.²⁷ The principle that "The King can do no wrong" shows he is absolute, just like other monarchs.²⁸ Comparison of the Puritan rebellion to the valiant Dutch rising against the Spaniard is mistaken and unjust.²⁹ The Dutch, in fact, have no King, but a Count.³⁰

Lastly, Salmasius explains why he has undertaken the defense: not because asked, but because of the merit of the case, for the King of England has a common cause with all other Kings.³¹ The reader must not suppose, Salmasius emphasizes, that he would have tyrants--may God's justice catch up with the parricides.

The Defensio Regia was widely read in France and Holland, but the precise nature of the public response to it is difficult to determine from correspondence of the period, because of the extent to which professional animosities or political views colored statements of the writers. If, because of a community of religion and trade, the Dutch were at first somewhat indifferent to the rivalry of English religions, the execution of Charles I changed the situation. At the request of the Prince of Wales, the States General vainly sent an embassy to forestall the King's execution: the Princess Mary Stuart had been married to the Stadtholder, William II, with Dr. Peter Du Moulin's uncle by marriage, André Rivet, negotiating the match. In the wave of Royalist sympathy which followed the execution, the Parliamentary ambassador, Strickland, was afraid to appear in public at The Hague. Was war indicated? The Stadtholder headed a war party and the States General refused to receive Strickland, but the ambassador was received by the province of Holland, which opposed a war with England. Moreover, Holland sent its own ambassador to England. The sudden death on 6 November 1650 of William II ended the internal crisis by removing the head of the Orange party.³² But there was a growing monarchical feeling among the Dutch,³³ and from about 1641 onwards there had been literary attacks upon the English Puritans, especially those by the Dutch poet and Catholic convert Joost van den Vondel (1587-1679).³⁴ The Latinist and poet Nicholas Heinsius strongly sympathized with the English Royalists. Not only did he write a twenty-line poem in Latin elegiacs entitled Carolus Primus Britanniarum Rex Nefarie a suis trucidatus,³⁵ but, in view of the strained diplomatic relations with England, his printer dropped from Christina Augusta, a long panegyric on the Queen of Sweden, thirteen lines appearing in an earlier edition of his Latin poems in attack upon the royal execution.³⁶ Many Dutch scholars reacted to Salmasius's Defensio Regia largely according to their personal feelings toward the author.³⁷

In France, however, the correspondence of Salmasius's friends reveals something of the reaction among the learned. With his usual enthusiasm for Salmasius, the physician Gui Patin reports from Paris on 28 May 1649 that Salmasius, upon the request of the Prince of Orange, has undertaken the Defensio Regia, wishes him success, and hopes the hated English have "autant de mal qu'ils en ont fait à leur roi."³⁸ If such uncritical admiration as that of Patin blinded some to defects in Salmasius's book, the level-headed Paris lawyer Claude Sarrau offered some valid criticisms of the Defensio Regia.³⁹ A mine of information about publication and editions of the Defensio,⁴⁰ the letters from Sarrau to Salmasius touch upon some of the points we have already singled out for comment. On 16 April 1649, Sarrau warns Salmasius not to extol Royal Majesty so that kings seem to freely give their love toward their subjects for nothing; for they ought to profit the people for whose sake they were created.⁴¹ Because of the flattery of courtiers, Sarrau points out, Kings know quite well enough the theoretical extent of their power, that they are absolute and unaccountable to any; "Sed istius potestatis verum, legitimum, & moderatum usum pauci eos docent"⁴² To Salmasius's assertion that Kings are liable to God alone, Sarrau rejoins that the English maintain otherwise:

. . . quin immo populos Regibus antiquiores eos constituisse ad se tutandos juxta latrarium Legum & consuetudinum praescriptas formulas affirmant. Non autem ut ad libidinem olim aut nuper ex communi Regni consilio stabilita vel refigant. Praeterea teneri Reges Sacramenti suae inaugurationis religione, quod si violaverint, se quoque posse illos contemnere & privatorum loco. Nec Anglicum facinus quanquam horrendum, ita est novum, ut exemplo careat.⁴³

Salmasius' statement in the Defensio Regia that he thought bishops were necessary in the discipline of the Anglican Church,⁴⁴ Sarrau remarks, surprised him and many others, in view of an attack Salmasius made on bishops in his De Episcopis & Presbyteris (1641), urging that they be done away with at the first opportunity.⁴⁵ Although Sarrau thinks Episcopacy might fit better than Presbyterianism in a monarchy, he writes on 11 April 1650 that Salmasius must be branded inconsistent in first calling for the deposing of bishops and then condemning those who—the Puritans—removed them.⁴⁶ Salmasius has also been rather hard on the English Presbyterians.⁴⁷ All in all, he reports, the Defensio Regia is getting a mixed reception, and praise for it is sometimes based on self-interest at Court. The obsequious approve its extreme statement of Divine Right, evidently, but "alii vero libertatem magis amant; quam existimant se in moderato regio imperio facilius posse tueri."⁴⁸

It was against this background of mixed reactions to the Defensio Regia and tense Anglo-Dutch relations that Milton's reply appeared. The moment was dramatic. John Milton undertook—"considente quasi tota Europa, & iudicium ferente," to silence the great Salmasius.⁴⁹ He wrote as an official spokesman, an Englishman, and a member of the community of Protestant humanism. Finishing the bulky Defensio Regia, Salmasius must, with Horace, have said to himself,

Exegi monumentum aere perennius
 Regalique situ pyramidum altius,
 Quod non imber edax, non Aquilo impotens
 Possit diruere aut innumerabilis
 Annorum series et fuga temporum

And Milton undoubtedly consoled himself with the same thought when he laid aside the Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio (1651) to face the world "Content though blind" from his "noble task, Of which all Europe talks from side to side." But if posterity has given a victory to Milton in this great humanistic contest, it is, when looked at fairly, a qualified victory. For despite his contemporary acclaim, Salmasius wrote under circumstances which hastened the erosion of time. He was defending a theory which was in fact artificial and repressive, holding no seed of future growth in itself and tending to stifle any literature which was not sycophantic. In defending King Charles, he was, because of the essential artificiality of the theory of Divine Right, often forced to argue from antique or Biblical evidence which had little to do with the pulse of contemporary life. Divine Right ignored the vitality, force, and generative power of the thought and emotions of the common man, sure to explode if bottled up too tightly. As a repressive theory, it contained no seed of growth. Salmasius was indeed treating an issue whose breadth, except for a more galvanic nature than his, meant diffusion and vulnerability. His mind was clear, capacious, and well stocked, but his talent was investigative and not one of creative analysis.⁵⁰ He had no deeply personal interest, no great religious and political enthusiasm to set him ablaze. Milton, however, possessed incidental advantages which limit his victory in such a contest. He was on the attack, and both Salmasius and his book presented relatively narrow targets for a greater concentration of his fire. As a creative genius, he had an urge, an intensity, a driving imaginative power-- restless qualities, all of them, which would perhaps have disturbed Salmasius's work as a great philologist and textual editor. Directed by his imperious spirit, these qualities gave Milton's utterances a memorable, oracular tone. He was maintaining a theory which pointed to the future, and he was destined for a poetic supremacy which would shed luster on his works about transitory historical events. Posterity, patriotism, sometimes chauvinism aided him. Salmasius made an adequate and complete, perhaps even an excellent case, but time and tide were with Milton.⁵¹

In preference to following his intricate evidence and arguments for Divine Right, we have examined the broad outlines of the theory, but more especially the approach by which Salmasius related the King's trial and execution to old political quarrels of the Continent. We have also viewed the picture of godly rascality and ruthless force he drew of the Puritans for those European nations, France and Holland, most likely to be cultivated by the rebel government. Peter Du Moulin resumes this aspect of the Salmasian Controversy and develops it further in Regi Sanguinis Clamor (1652) which, intended as a stopgap until Salmasius should reply to Milton, ironically proved a more bitingly effective work than the Defensio Regia itself. Since Du Moulin, in borrowing liberally from Salmasius, follows the same line in his own polemics, it is helpful to see how Milton treats these questions. Some of Salmasius's arguments would seem difficult, perhaps impossible, to refute. Milton therefore sets his rebuttal of theory in a framework of rhetoric intended to ridicule Salmasius and his book, darken the character of King Charles, eulogise Parliament as the spokesman of the English people, and impart a glowing idealism to the Puritan doctrine of popular sovereignty. Milton turns the production of the Defensio Regia into a beggar's opera, with Salmasius, the "Prince of Letters," cast as an addled, fumbling grammarian, the hireling of a threadbare King.⁵² A foreigner, meddling in English affairs,⁵³ he has produced a shapeless, disordered book which, through its sheer boredom, will discourage refutation.⁵⁴ Madame Saumaise, who had gained international fame as a shrew, also appears: if her Gallic husband would be the cock (lat. Gallus) of the barnyard, he only succeeds in being henpecked.⁵⁵ For writing this drivel, Milton crows, the miserable turncoat thankfully accepted a hundred Jacobuses scraped together by starving King Charles II, and sent by a royal chaplain.⁵⁶

Having provided this cast of characters, Milton turns to the theory of Divine Right which Salmasius champions. To this, he flatly opposes his counter-theory of popular sovereignty and delegated authority:

To sum up the whole truth, Parliament is the supreme council of the nation, constituted and appointed by an absolutely free people, and armed with ample power and authority, for this end and purpose: viz., to consult together upon the most weighty affairs; the king was created to take care there should be executed, obedient to their vote and resolution, all the acts and decrees of those Orders, Estates, or Houses.⁵⁷

The people were anterior to the King (here he recalls Sarrau),⁵⁸ in delegating power to the King for public safety and liberty, the people have made no absolute or unconditional grant of power. If the King fails his duty, he voids the grant.⁵⁹ Kings do not inherit their people like brute animals, goods, or chattels,⁶⁰ and since the safety of the people, not of a tyrant, is the supreme law, the people may get rid of a bad King and resume their original power.⁶¹ The contention that the King cannot commit treason against his vassals and subjects is ridiculous--feudal law itself arms the vassal against a bad lord, even to death. A whole nation has the same right against a tyrant.⁶²

One of Salmasius's most telling charges was that the High Court of Parliament had been a tool of the Army in the King's trial, and a mutilated Parliament at that. There was not much Milton could say to this; the facts were painfully true. The absence of the temporal and spiritual lords he tries to cover by contending that the essence of Parliament was in the House of Commons; and that Commons was therefore able to abolish the upper house. Denying that it failed to represent the people, he excuses its imperfect character by the desertion of Royalist sympathizers to the King's forces. Moreover, Parliament has the right to delegate its power to the trial court.⁶³ As for the military domination of the court, the King was an enemy and this was in effect a court-martial.⁶⁴ Thus, so far as he can, Milton whitewashes the Regicides. For effective contrast, he uses a tar-brush on the defendant, Charles I. If some Englishmen are comparing Charles to Christ, Milton likens him to the parricide Nero and accuses Charles of poisoning his father James I, in complicity with the Duke of Buckingham.⁶⁵ But what about the metaphor of the King as father of his country? In reply, Milton draws a careful distinction between paternal and regal power, especially in that the King did not create the people, but the people the King.⁶⁶

Another familiar issue appeared in the Pro Populo Anglicano, the debate about Episcopacy extending back to Pierre Du Moulin and Bishop Andrewes. Salmasius, we will remember, had earlier written against Episcopacy, but had modified his views in the Defensio Regia. To further his portrayal of Salmasius as a turncoat, Milton denounced him as a toady who had exchanged the Geneva gown for the bishop's rochet.⁶⁷

But what of the broad diplomatic issues affecting war or peace? Salmasius had dwelt repeatedly on the sinister threat posed for all thrones by the revolutionary government. He had linked the Puritan political doctrines unmistakably to those of the Jesuits and the Papacy, and their dangerous potential for secular governments. Salmasius was right, and there was not much Milton could say. He indeed acknowledges the charges, but never confronts them squarely, particularly the link to the Jesuits. Milton could hardly afford to say much of this. As for the accusations of Puritan danger, Milton evades them, and indirectly seeks to minimize their effect by portraying Salmasius, their source, as a squeaking kindergarten rhetorician sounding a call to war.⁶⁸

What to do with Salmasius's treatment of the two wings of Puritanism, the Presbyterians and the Independents, was a problem with which Milton did not successfully cope. Each presented its own difficulty. Compared to the Kirk of Scotland, the English Presbyterians had only a "theoretical and nebulous" understanding of a Presbyterian structure and its feasibility in England.⁶⁹ If not by actual polity, at least by aspirations and general beliefs they should have belonged to the community of Reformed Churches in France and Holland, whose gospel splendor they so admired, and endorsement they sought. The English Presbyterians were blemished by their lack of official status and their activities in the Civil Wars. They had at first moved rebellion against their King, and then, out of a greed for power and lust to persecute, joined him to oppose the Independents, too late. But the French Reformed, for self-preservation in Catholic France, had veered to a theory of obedience and Divine Right, while the Dutch Reformed had an appreciable sentiment, by political faction, for monarchy. From the Reformed standpoint, Salmasius treated the English Presbyterians correctly, condemning their earlier leadership in the revolt but exculpating them of Charles's death. Their record, however, was anomalous, and Milton's treatment of it equivocal. He merely repeats the spanking given them in the Defensio Regia, in an attempt to drive them back, through fear of vengeance in case the Stuarts returned, to a common cause with the Independents.⁷⁰ But when Salmasius had linked the political doctrines of the Independents to the Jesuits, he had forged a chain which Milton could not break. If two fanatics, reportedly inspired by Jesuit theories, had assassinated two French kings, the English Independents had officially capped a civil war by asserting popular sovereignty with a public sacrifice to prove the point. Where Salmasius, almost anticipating Du Moulin, clearly spelled out the Independent threat to Kings, Milton hopefully skipped over the embarrassing fact:

Why should I not pass by the telltale rascalities upon which you spend a great part of the rest of your chapter, and those prodigious tenets that you ascribe to the Independents, to render them odious? For they concern not at all this disputed question about kings, and are for the most part such as deserve anybody's laughter or contempt rather than refutation.⁷¹

Because the controversy soon turned in another direction and Salmasius's reply to Milton was not published until seven years after his death in 1653, it may be impossible to judge, by the impact of the documents themselves, who really won. National pride in Milton's poetic genius and in later constitutional evolution color critical opinion in England and, to some extent, in America. In France, the government of Cardinal Mazarin, largely because of Cromwell's military power, reached a sort of accommodation with the Puritan governments, and the Huguenots could scarcely call their loyalty into question as Louis XIV gradually whittled away Protestant liberties. On this score, Salmasius was on the winning side, for the royal prerogative would soon find a consummate spokesman in Bossuet. But if in Holland the evidence is not final about Salmasius, it seems clearer as to Milton. His book must have caused some stir, if only because of the anticipation of a reply to Salmasius. Indeed, Scherpbier has found that "The Dutch public appears to have relished the scandal in the book, but not the principles by the book Milton had become notorious, not famous. The Defensio was an impediment rather than a help for Milton's reputation in the Republic of the United Provinces."⁷² After reviewing the factors which made Pro Populo Anglicano unacceptable to either the republican or the Orange party, he concludes that

. . . however much similarity there might be between the original principles of the Dutch Republic and those of the English Commonwealth, the later history of the Republic was such that no sympathetic response could be awakened there to the defense of the proceedings against a king. The publication of the Defensio caused some commotion in Holland, but it was only of a sensational nature. No lasting interest was roused. On the contrary, the difference between the two republics, the one democratic and, later on, dictatorial, the other in germ monarchical, was emphasized by it.⁷³

Milton's Pro Populo Anglicano appeared while Salmasius was in Sweden. The scholar had been invited by the impetuous Swedish Amazon, Queen Christina, and in July, 1650, he obtained a leave of absence from the curators of the University of Leyden to go to Stockholm.⁷³ His triumphal reception there is an oft-repeated legend.⁷⁴ Milton chose to believe that the impact of Pro Populo at the Swedish court was so great that Salmasius fell out of favor, and had to retire, crestfallen, to France in the latter part of 1651.⁷⁵ Christina lived a life of sensation, but if she was delighted with Milton's lampoon enough to grow cool toward the scholar, the lapse of Salmasius from royal favor was temporary.⁷⁶ There were reports that he was at work on an answer to Milton, and when he left Stockholm, despite Christina's pleas to stay, he may have carried the book's beginning with him back to Holland.⁷⁷ Depending on contemporary political views, Milton's fame, or notoriety, continued to grow. Wilhelmus Wormius, son of the celebrated Olaus Wormius and "a strong anti-Miltonian," visited England in 1652; and when he was shown at the Exchange an inscription, allegedly by Milton, over the empty site of a statue of Charles I, the young Swede penned the following epigram:

Monstrum immane ingens Milton cui lumen adeptus

Post hac non Regi scommata plura dabit.⁷⁸

Milton was indeed gaining a kind of reputation. The year 1651 saw two violent literary onslaughts on the blind poet, one an answer on behalf of Salmasius to the Pro Populo Anglicano, and the other a rejoinder to Eikonoklastes, which later had an interesting connection with Salmasius's posthumous reply. Upholding Salmasius against Milton was the anonymous Pro Rege et Populo Anglicano Apologia, contra Johannis Polypragmatici (alias Miltoni Angli) Defensionem Destructivam Regis et Populi Anglicani (Antwerp, 1651). Written by Joseph Jane, the reply to Eikonoklastes was entitled Eikon Aklastos The Image Unbrooken. A Perspective of the Impudence, Falshood, Vanitie, and Prophannes, Published in a Libell entitled Eikonoklastes against Eikon Basilike Or the Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majestie in his solitudes and Sufferings (n.p., 1651).⁷⁹ A point-by-point refutation of Eikonoklastes, the Eikon Aklastos says of Milton that if "he had written his booke in a Ferreigne, or learned language, his unfaithfullness, and impudence would be as open, and odious as his vanitie is ridiculous."⁸⁰ To the Apologia for Salmasius against Milton, John Philips, the poet's nephew, replied the following year with Joannis Philippi Angli Responsio Ad Apologiam Anonymi cujusdam tenebrionis pro Rege & Populo Anglicano infantissiman (London, 1652).⁸¹

These works, viewed as polemics, were mediocre compared to another book 1652 brought. With the appearance of Peter Du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum adversus Parricidas Anglicanos (The Hague, 1652), the Salmasian Controversy took a different turn. A new approach to the quarrel was needed, particularly in the Royalist camp, for Salmasius and Milton had exhausted the usual technique of clubbing quotations in their duel of political quarterstaff. Du Moulin therefore avoided a tedious wrestling with political abstractions and textual medlies in order to concentrate directly upon influencing the currents of international issues and treating the personalities involved in them. He did so with a sustained forward thrust of organization and biting invective which neither Salmasius, nor even Milton as yet, had consistently shown. Though in works other than the Defensio Regia Salmasius had been noted for a certain vehemence,⁸² the net effect of his invective in that book, because of his clutter of authorities, had been rather occasional. While Milton in Pro Populo Anglicano tracked Salmasius through the mire of quotations, he could not concentrate his fire as in the Defensio Secunda. Du Moulin was the first to aim for direct impact. If his work lacks the sublime, prophetic egotism of the Defensio Secunda, on its own merits the Regii Sanguinis Clamor is worthy to stand by Milton's answer. With an unerring grasp reminiscent of his father, he seizes upon the diplomatic cruxes of the controversy, and develops them with point and clarity. It is a dangerous book. Making the most of the international shock felt at Charles's trial and execution, Regii Sanguinis Clamor sharply focuses its political implications for European kings, and, in the light of the Counter-Reformation, the jeopardy in which the event could place the Reformed Churches. In terms of the King's odorous trial and of Puritan greed and vandalism, it tore away the veil of winsome ideals which Milton had draped over the unlovely military rule of the Independents. On the accepted principle of destroying opposition by ruining the character of its spokesman, Milton had been the first to deal in personalities. By his tasteless ridicule and defamation of Salmasius, he had invited repayment in kind. When, however, the retort came in Regii Sanguinis Clamor, he was totally unprepared for the electric energy of the attack, and was long affected by its shock.

Since one of our purposes has been to provide a usable translation of Du Moulin's book for further study, we may allow it to speak for itself in specific passages. Because, however, we have tried to develop the extensive background which makes it a significant part of its times, some insight into its direction and method of organization may be welcome. The preliminary matter--a dedication to Charles II and an epistle to the Christian Reader--is interesting chiefly as it plays off Salmasius against Milton and bears on the problem of the book's authorship. The dedication extols Salmasius, anticipates his reply to Milton, and likens the blind poet to a monstrous Cyclops. The Christian Reader is informed that the anonymous author is personally familiar with the rebellion, execution, and their significance, and is told one source of the book. Chapters One and Two begin the exploration of a line of attack opened up by Salmasius. The magnitude of the crime and its impact abroad are constantly dwelt on, and the major personalities contrasted. Salmasius and King Charles are favorably placed in the spotlight, while Milton and Cromwell move in sinister shadows. In Chapter One, the learning, eloquence, and reasoning of the "Prince of Letters," Salmasius, are given unstinted praise, especially as shown in the Defensio Regia. Against such magnitude is contrasted the indecent audacity of that sniveling rogue, John Milton. This reverses the picture which emerges from Pro Populo Anglicano. Du Moulin justifies the angry invective of Salmasius as falling short of the crime's enormity, and gives examples of Puritan cruelty after the Battles of Naseby, Preston, and Dunbar. The principle of dramatic contrast is intensified in Chapter Two. An account of the negotiations between the King and the Puritans, during which Parliament debates vainly as Cromwell and the Army apply force ever more ruthlessly, builds to a climax in the King's trial and execution. Milton's charge that the King was a parricide is modest compared to Du Moulin's treatment of the Regicide court. At his hands, the Royal Martyr--always equally intent on preserving law, liberty, and religion--moves with stately dignity through his successive misfortunes, and fearlessly acts out his part before a malignant and malodorous tribunal. Fanatic whoremasters, bankrupts, and brewers judge the Lord's anointed. Making a comparison of Charles to Christ, Du Moulin movingly portrays the King's last hours and death, and Bishop Juxon's mistreatment after the execution. The Eikon Basilike is copiously praised. Though not accorded a direct portrait, Cromwell moves steadily in the background as an hypocritical contriver who plots the King's doom.⁸³

Chapter Three, "The Parricides' Crimes against the People," is an attack on the doctrine of popular sovereignty put forward to justify the rebellion, trial, and execution of the King, and treatment of the Church by the Puritans. Did the people, Du Moulin asks, have any authority against the King? Great Salmasius has proved they did not. But was the King punished and the Kingship abolished by the people's authority and will? The people were not authors of the Puritans' deeds, since they were done against popular will. Much of the chapter is cast as an extended denunciation by the "People" of their "delegates," who had assumed a power the people never arrogated to themselves, and, with no commission from the people, had depraved Religion and killed the King, thus removing the foundation whereon the laws stood. As the "People" express it, England had been happy in the old way, a nice balance of liberty and obedience. But government by law has now been replaced with government by plunder, and the "guardians of Liberty" have put England in chains. A grim picture is given of a tyranny of military rule supported by hired spies.⁸⁴

Chapters Four and Five are a blistering indictment of religious hypocrisy demonstrated by the Puritans in their treatment of the Church and in attributing their deeds of blood to the Lord. The Puritans and especially the Independents, Du Moulin states in Chapter Four, have always pleaded religious motives and inspiration for their actions. How then did they treat the Church? The Church, he contends, had been wrecked by greed, fanatic enthusiasm, and abysmal ignorance. Reflecting Hooker's concept of a Church coterminous with the nation, Du Moulin holds that in mistreating the people, the Puritans were mangling the Church. Suffering alike have been "the King of Israel" and "the People of God." The Puritans have destroyed the ministry by replacing learned, pious men with ignorant, destructive fanatics. This has been worsened by Puritan avarice and greed in looting the Church lands and revenues.⁸⁵ Moreover, he asserts in Chapter Five, the hypocritical Puritans have injured the Lord by allegedly pursuing their campaign of wanton mutilation to the Glory of God. By no means should the military success of the Puritan government be taken as an argument of God's blessing upon their evil deeds.

We have seen already how Du Moulin resumes and develops such themes from Salmasius as the international effect of the heinous execution of Charles, the ruthless military tyranny--a "stratocracy"--imposed on England, the murderous illegality of the King's trial, and the dangerous fanaticism of the Independents. Linking the Independents to Jesuit theories of popular sovereignty and tyrannicide, he describes them as the public enemies of mankind. This last point Du Moulin uses as the common topic of Chapters Six and Seven of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, chapters in which he pleads for European action against the Puritan government, even to the extent of armed intervention. The appeal is addressed particularly to the French and Dutch, with whom the Commonwealth badly needed good diplomatic relations. Reviewing the dangerous precedent for all Kings set by the English affair, Du Moulin in Chapter Six urges French military action and, perfectly aware of the political divisions in the Netherlands, tries to neutralize any mistaken sympathy shown the Puritans because of a false equation of the Dutch struggle for freedom with the English rebellion. His appeal to the French, Du Moulin grounds on a skillful combination of sentiment and fear. To appreciate its adroitness, we must remember that France had been kept in turmoil for years both by the occasions when the restive Huguenots had been forced to resort to arms to keep their dwindling liberties, and by the protracted debates between Huguenot champions of passive obedience and Divine Right (such as Pierre Du Moulin) and advocates of Jesuit doctrines of deposition and tyrannicide (such as Bellarmine and Du Perron). Salmasius rightly linked Independent and Papal theories; but in seeking French interference Du Moulin had to be more careful, for the Jesuits had the ear of the French King. Therefore, when he addresses Louis XIV and the French nobility, Du Moulin appeals to family sympathy and pride wounded by the shabby Puritan treatment of the English Queen, Henriette Marie, the aunt of King Louis. As Louis XIV was centralizing arts, letters, etiquette, and absolute political power in the classical elegance of Versailles, Du Moulin held up the ranting bogeyman of the popular state arising across the Channel. An attack is timely, he urges, while the revolutionary government is still unsettled.

The Dutch presented a problem requiring a different approach. With their political life strongly divided between republican and Orange factions, it might have been too much to hope for armed intervention to avenge the Stadtholder's father-in-law. Danger could easily lie the other way. For years, the Puritans had sought whatever aid they could get from the Dutch Calvinists. Politically, the natural line for them to take was to attempt a parallel between Dutch resistance to the Spaniard and Puritan struggles against the English Crown. Du Moulin represents this as an insulting comparison between English madness and Dutch valor. Besides affronting the Dutch, he points out (as Salmasius had done before him),⁸⁶ that such a resemblance ignored the political fact that the Hapsburgs had not been Kings of Holland, but Counts merely, and hence not absolute rulers above sharing their power. Du Moulin cautions that the Estates' reception of Parliamentary ambassadors, necessitated by commerce, should not be strained into an interpretation of any Dutch approval of the English rebellion. On the contrary, the real Dutch sentiment is shown in the hostile reception given the ambassadors by the commoners.

A subject on which Du Moulin wrote several times is discussed in Chapter Seven, "The Parricides' Injury to the Reformed Churches." To gain credit, moral support, and possibly political help, the English Puritans had tried to form bonds between themselves and the Reformed Churches of Europe at the expense of the Establishment. Du Moulin had already attacked this attempt in his Letter of a French Protestant and his Apologie de la Religion Reformée, et de la Monarchie de l'Eglise d'Angleterre In Regii Sanguinis Clamor, he warned the Reformed bodies away from the English rebels by pointing out the opportunity they give for Catholic propaganda that Protestantism is essentially revolutionary and subversive. This was also the theme of his later Vindication. Such a conviction, he asserted, might cause Princes to take measures against the Protestant churches under them.

The remaining prose in Regii Sanguinis Clamor need not concern us long. Chapter Eight is a summary of the reasons why everybody should turn upon the English parricides and their crime, and the Royal Flood—as the Eikon Basilike and Salmasius said it would—is heard at some length calling down vengeance from Heaven in ringing Latin. There is also an epistle from Samuel Bochart to Dr. Morley⁸⁷ showing the indignant reaction in France, along with an account of several other prominent Huguenot protests.⁸⁸

It is the remaining verse which is most interesting. Here, Du Moulin again pairs off the great antagonists Salmasius and Milton. Salmasius is celebrated with a Thanksgiving Ode for the Defensio Regia, while in Latin iambics is written the most devastating onslaught ever made upon John Milton before the world. Controversy has taken on better manners since then, and it is doubtless a cheap and cruel satisfaction to enjoy the wrecking of another's good name. As perhaps the best poem about the drama of the King's execution, Marvell's An Horatian Ode rises, in its treatment of Charles and Cromwell, to a poised urbanity which escapes the inroads of time. Furthermore, without becoming flat, the Ode avoids needless exaggeration, and thus the reproach of strained, manufactured emotion. It shows a fine literary tact. Not so with most such verse of the period. In this light, Du Moulin's Alcaic strophes on Salmasius have suffered badly. His command of rhetoric and Latin prosody is enough to give the verse a kind of animation, and in some places his effects may be called neat. But its underlying conceit--that of a gouty philologist triumphantly brandishing a goose-quill--could escape the smiles of only the most narrowly devoted clique. Salmasius becomes a Don Quixote with Du Moulin cast as Sancho Panza. But if we may briefly concede the century its vein of uncurbed invective, the lines against Milton are another story. Here is drawn a different Milton from the blind seer of the Paradise poems or the dark glory of Samson Agonistes. Here, from the palpable obscurity of Scribbler's Alley, comes a starved hireling of base origin to employ his venal pen for the defense of pickpockets and footpads who have murdered their King, and are revelling in the loot from the crime. Using a rich vocabulary of abuse, the iambics sustain this picture with a bristling vitality to the end of the poem. It is written with a lofty disdain which, of all attitudes, must have infuriated Milton the most. If the Dedication's comparison of him to a blind Cyclops, or the scandal raked up later in the book affected Milton, the attack in verse must have completed the crushing of his ego. The stercoraceous Muse Cloacina had drowned out his praise of virtue, and it would take a prodigious effort to redeem himself. Vae homini qui talia scripserat!

Whoever might be identified as the author of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, when Milton had gathered his forces, was sure to face the strongest attack the poet could make, and, if an Englishman, great danger to his life. Prudent as always, Du Moulin had evidently foreseen this, and had published the book anonymously. And though the majority of scholars touching on the Salmasian Controversy have considered the work to be his, the fact of Du Moulin's authorship has not until now been conclusively stated. Since his own account, however, agrees with all available data, it may be accepted as final, and his authorship as unquestioned.⁸⁹ The principal sources for Regii Sanguinis Clamor also can be ascertained.

The history of the book's publication grows out of the very atmosphere of Protestant humanism. Like any man of education, Du Moulin tried his hand at Latin verse, and at some time in the early 1640's, before the Civil Wars had seriously rent the nation, had begun thirteen Latin hymns on the Apostles' Creed. He had begun a correspondence with Salmasius--when or how cannot be ascertained--and obtained the great scholar's criticisms of the first five poems as well as his encouragement to continue writing.⁸⁹ In response to a public plea of Charles I, Du Moulin resolved (as we have seen) that "as farre as Latin and French could goe in the world, I would make the justice of the king's and the church's cause to be known, especially to the Protestants of France and the Low Countries, whom the king's enemies did chiefly labour to seduce and misinforme."⁹⁰ As a result, Du Moulin had begun his Apologie de la Religion Reformée during the siege of York in 1644, sent it to Holland for publication through Pompeo Calandrini, but recalled the manuscript for alterations after the King's execution.⁹¹ In the revised version, he inserted an encomium on Salmasius's Defensio Regia⁹² before the volume was printed "very negligently" by Samuel Browne at The Hague.⁹³ At about the same time, Du Moulin was publishing his poem Ecclesiae Gemitus, which strongly foreshadowed his account in Regii Sanguinis Clamor of the Church's ruination by the Puritans.⁹⁴ Thus, he was already engaged on works whose viewpoint and theme coincided perfectly with the Defensio Regia, which he, like all other fluent Latinists of the Royalist persuasion, was busily absorbing. His literary consciousness of the Royal tragedy was further sharpened by the Royalist history of the Civil War, the Elenchus Motuum nuperorum in Anglia of George Bate, M.D. Thus, when Milton's Pro Populo Anglicano appeared in 1651 and Du Moulin decided to write again for the King's cause and uphold Salmasius, he was already in the vein and had material from which to work. Apart from the ease with which he wrote Latin, Du Moulin probably composed the Regii Sanguinis Clamor with some speed, for nearly seventy pages demonstrably rely on Bate's Elenchus while the rest, particularly in declamatory parts, recalls Salmasius at nearly every turn.⁹⁵

Perhaps the most obvious use of Bate by Du Moulin is his treatment of the King's final speech on the scaffold and the events following. With two notable exceptions, Du Moulin quotes substantially the Latin text given by Bate, substituting synonyms or altering grammatical constructions somewhat to preserve his own Latin style.⁹⁶ His two chief additions to Bate are a moralising digression on the King's penitent reference to the fate of Strafford,⁹⁷ intended to show the pious conscience of Charles to advantage; and a portrait of Bishop Juxon comforting the King there, and of the Bishop's later imprisonment and questioning by the Regicides as to what the King had meant by his farewell injunction "Remember! Remember!"⁹⁸ Indeed, Du Moulin made a little homiletic drama of Juxon's questioning by the parricides. When pressed as to what the late King had ordered him to "Remember! Remember!", Juxon said he had been ordered to give Charles II his father's dying command to forgive his killers. As Du Moulin paints the scene, this shocked the parricides and left them prey to remorse and ripe for a tardy repentance. If the scene appears to us, as it did to Milton, not quite spontaneous, that it was effective is clear from the pains Milton took to discredit it.⁹⁹ In other portions of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, it seems thankless at moments to try to determine whether Bate or Salmasius influenced a given passage, for a number of places in the Defensio Regia strongly recall the Klenchus.¹⁰⁰ It is a kind of tribute to Du Moulin's ability that he could synthesize this varied material into so well-knit a book as Regii Sanguinis Clamor.

As Du Moulin finished the book, he recalls, he sent the sheets to Salmasius, who entrusted them to his associate Alexander More for printing.¹⁰¹ A brilliant Greek scholar and preacher of Franco-Scotch blood, More had a faculty for making enemies, and during his stormy career had come from the oppressive confines of Geneva by way of Middleburg to Amsterdam, where he was professor of history.¹⁰² In an age of iron-clad orthodoxy, he ventured somewhat to think for himself, and his tactlessness made bitter enemies who tried unsuccessfully to convict him of heresy, and later, when this failed, relished whatever scandal of immorality could be used to discredit him.¹⁰³ More took the manuscript of Du Moulin's book to the vagabond printer Adrian Vlacq at The Hague, and supervised printing of the book so busily that he drew attention to himself.¹⁰⁴ First appearing in quarto, Regii Sanguinis Clamor went into new editions the same year (1652), and Milton soon began attempts to find the author of the offending book. Hearing that More had helped with publication of the book, he concluded that he had written the work also, and began writing his attack upon Regii Sanguinis Clamor and More as the author.¹⁰⁵

There were, however, such strong indications of More's innocence that Milton, if he had not been obsessed with pain and vengeance, should have listened to them as carefully as he did the tittle-tattle which More's enemies gleefully provided. Learning that Milton was planning to assail him, he sent a disclaimer to Milton by such a responsible figure as the Dutch Ambassador to England, Nieupoort, who forwarded it by Secretary of State Thurloe. Very fairly, More asked that

Milton either suppress his answer, or else avoid defaming him wrongly as the author.¹⁰⁶ Milton, however, insisted that More was the author and ironically promised that nothing "unbecoming" would come from his pen.¹⁰⁷

Another warning which Milton might well have heeded was the glaring discrepancy in style between the Dedication to Charles II and the rest of the book. In point of Latinity, to which Milton if anyone was highly sensitised, the Dedication's thorny Senecan style differed markedly from the easier flow of the Epistle to the Reader and eight chapters of prose, as well as the bitter verse appendices. As it addressed Charles II, the Dedication showed a familiarity with courtly address and rhetorical skill which a printer might well not show, even Vlaeq, who put out the Dedication under his name and wrote a competent Latin in an entirely different style. Even later in the controversy, when these facts must have been apparent to Milton, he still charged More with full responsibility for the book. It was in the Dedication that he had been termed a Cyclops.

When Milton's Defensio Secunda appeared in 1654--more Joannis Miltoni Angli than Pro Populo Anglicano--More was so blackened by Milton's tar brush that the solvent of research is only now uncovering his original complexion.¹⁰⁸ Already the object of much study, the Defensio Secunda need not be reviewed lengthily here. Aside from the old ridicule of Salmasius, the Defensio Secunda shows Milton sitting on a bad eminence of impassioned rhetoric to crush More, extol Cromwell and other revolutionary leaders, and hymn the Queen of Sweden for discourtesy to Salmasius. Biographically, it shows the deep scars left by Du Moulin's bolts of invective. The line from the Aeneid describing the Cyclops, which More had applied to Milton--"Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum"--occasions the poet's famous rationale of his blindness related to passages in Paradise Lost and Samson.¹⁰⁹ The evil character of Milton given in Du Moulin's iambs, and the "Thanksgiving" Ode are treated scornfully, but aside from Milton's justly laconic remarks on the Ode, one may easily sense how deeply Du Moulin's barbs had sunk into Milton:

Indeed, as I have no private malice or enmity against any man, nor, as far as I know, has any man against me, I am the less concerned at the torrent of abuse which is cast upon me, at the numberless reproaches which are hurled against me, as I bear all this not for myself, but for the sake of the commonwealth.¹¹⁰

In general, the Defensio Secunda is both sermon and epideictic oratory to celebrate the leaders and spokesman of the Puritan cause, to discredit its enemies, and to persuade the English people to virtue.¹¹¹ Its defense of the people is indirect only. Compared to the clear and logical development of Regii Sanguinis Glamor, its form is rhapsodic. And yet it creates a unified, powerful impact. As it rises inexorably to the peroration, there is little or no feeling of rambling or superfluity. Rather, one's admiration is claimed by the deepest voice of Protestant humanism--at once that of oracle and sage. In the sight of the nations, a prophet of Israel has mounted the Roman Rostrum to cry out the English Law, and is heard. The Defensio Secunda has indeed the self-conscious command of a classical orator, but, except for its enemies, the Defensio is relieved of an unworthy egotism by its burning ethical conviction. It is by the speaker's fiery personality and the surging cadences of his Latin—by turns sardonic or fervent—that the Defensio is fused into a masterpiece. Even beside it, however, Regii Sanguinis Clamor still remains a virile and effective work.

Convinced that his sayings of the wise accorded with Divine will,¹¹² Milton paraded a rogues' gallery in review—Salmasius, King Charles, Vlaeq, and More. A prodigy in Greek and a brilliant preacher,¹¹³ More is depicted as a spiritual vagrant whose theology and eye for women both go astray. After daring to wander from the sacrosanct truth of Genevan orthodoxy, Milton declares, Alexander More

. . . by chance conceived a passion for a certain maid of his host, and continued to pursue her even though she was soon afterward wed to another; the neighbors oft would see them together by themselves enter a certain little garden cottage now he could praise the garden beds, or desire nothing but the shade, or might merely be allowed to insert a more into a fig, and from thence with the utmost speed to beget many, many figamores—a most delightfull stroll: he could have shown the maiden the method of engrafting: that he could have done these and many others, who denies? . . .¹¹⁴

Censured by the ministers of Geneva as an adulterer, Milton charges,¹¹⁵ More was invited to Holland by the French Church at Middleburg through the influence of Salmasius; and obtained cold letters testimonial from Geneva on condition that he leave the city.¹¹⁶ While paying his respects to Salmasius, More was taken with a serving-maid in the household, and as he and Salmasius (allegedly) began to plan composition of Regi Sanguinis Clamor, he found the conversations a good pretext to visit the house and seduce the maid, Bontia (or Pontia).¹¹⁷ As Bontia, spurned, complained to the synod and magistrates, Milton says, a literary miracle occurred:

From this union there at length befell a certain thing marvelous, and prodigious beyond the wont of nature, that both woman and man brought forth--Pontia, forsooth, a Morelet . . . More this addled and windy egg, from which burst forth that dropsical drum, the Royal Blood's Outcry. This indeed was at first a most gratefully pleasing sop for our Royalists starving in Belgium; now that the shell is cracked open, they turn away from the discovery's corruption and stench Whence someone--of a droll wit, too, whoever he was--wrote this couplet:

That nicely moored on Gallic More's sweet couch,
Enamored Pontia swelled, who'll not avouch?¹¹⁸

Delighted with the book's praise of him, Salmasius took it to Vlacq for publication.¹¹⁹ Vlacq is shown--with some truth--as another vagabond, a dishonest and debt-ridden printer who migrated from London to Paris and turned up at The Hague. After having sought business vainly from Milton, he now permitted his name to be affixed to the Dedication abusing the poet.¹²⁰ Well aware of the powerful appeal of Du Moulin's picture of the late King on the scaffold, Milton turns Charles the Martyr into Charles the hypocrite. He denounces the comparison of Charles to Christ,¹²¹ and accuses the King of contriving the incident arising from the command "Remember! Remember!"¹²²

Balancing these characters is a group of panegyrics. Cromwell is given unstinted praise;¹²³ Christina of Sweden, who had reportedly snubbed Salmasius, is paid fulsome adulation.¹²⁴ After defaming the slain King, Milton did what he could to exculpate the trial by an extended tribute to John Bradshaw, the president of the court. In view of the trial records, as well as Du Moulin's account, his material may have been intractable.¹²⁵ There is, of course, Milton's self-justification, particularly the autobiographical account covering his youth, his days at Cambridge, the Continental tour, his divorce tracts, his earlier political writings, and his entrance into the Salmasian Controversy.¹²⁶ All of these had figured in Du Moulin's vilification of Milton. Possibly to help vindicate his own character further as well as to offset his abuse of Salmasius and More, Milton also provided Cromwell and the English people with a guide to a life of virtue.¹²⁷

The appeal of Regii Sanguinis Clamor to European nations and the Reformed Churches also had to be considered. By now, the Puritan government was more secure, a fact reflected in Milton's treatment of the question. As for the Dutch treatment of the English embassy, Milton points to the mutual renewal of perpetual peace. So far as the example of the Dutch rebellion is concerned, he asserts, England does not follow others but leads the way to liberty.¹²⁸ There are several slighting references to the Orange party, namely, that through its help Salmasius got a professorship for More in Holland, and that the Prince of Orange had rewarded Salmasius for the Defensio Regia, in addition to the famed hundred Jacobuses from Charles II.¹²⁹

In view of Du Moulin's attempts to distinguish the English Puritans from the Huguenots, the attitude of Milton toward the Reformed has particular interest. He tends almost to divorce religion from politics. He points out that the French government has sought the goodwill of England three times.¹³⁰ As for the French Protestants, they had already taken up arms against their Kings, and their divines--as other Calvinists, witness the Vindiciae contra Tyrannos--had preached resistance to tyrants, even if the English were the first to execute one.¹³¹ Indeed, if the Huguenots had been able, they would have done the same thing.¹³² With its lack of appreciation of the uncomfortable status of the French Reformed, Milton's curious statement suggests that, because of promising diplomatic relations, he was not at the moment greatly concerned for Huguenot support of the Puritan government. If some coolness had grown between Huguenots and Puritans, Du Moulin's books apparently helped bring it about.¹³³

Milton evidently made no extended examination of Du Moulin's sources. Du Moulin's epistle to the Christian Reader had mentioned the Elenchus Motuum nuperorum as a source, and Milton dismissed this book as suspect because of its Royalist bias.¹³⁴ His narratives, Milton noted, Du Moulin had taken partly from the Elenchus and partly from the Defensio Regia.¹³⁵ Though both books were clearly familiar to him, he was too absorbed with personalities and panegyrics to spend much time on plagiarism.

Du Moulin, meanwhile, watched with smug amusement the defamation Milton was heaping on Alexander More.¹³⁶ As he put it, he watched with a quick smile his baby left at another's doorstep, and the blind and furious Milton flailing the air at a secret adversary he could not see.¹³⁷ Unequal to such hate, More grew cold in the Royal cause and revealed the real author's name to Milton. When the revelation was made, we may never know; but Du Moulin, who was in England and Ireland tutoring in the Boyle family, was in serious danger.¹³⁸ Thanks to God, he exults, Milton's pride became Du Moulin's protection: for having made his attack on More's life and reputation such an important part of the Defensio Secunda, Milton could not bring himself to admit he had been grossly deceived. Finding a kind of adjustment by thinking of himself as a blind prophet illumined within, he would have found it dreadful to risk a psychological collapse from the ridicule sure to come if he admitted his error about More. Nor could the Regicide government afford to have its very articulate champion discredited--his eloquence made into apothecoses of hypocrites and hangmen, his noble preachments into a frenzy of megalomania, the Cause itself a bloody extravaganza defended by a madman. Milton, if no more than subconsciously, preferred the safety of Du Moulin to the ridicule of himself, and thus ironically became Du Moulin's protector.¹⁴⁰

In its sequel, the Salmasian Controversy turns to a progressively worse abuse of personalities. Never again would the really central issues be treated with the clear focus and spirited invective of Du Moulin, or the lofty ethical vision and magniloquence of the Defensio Secunda. But even as he labored under severe handicaps, Alexander More defended himself ably. Bound by his honor, for a while at least, to protect Du Moulin,¹⁴¹ and surrounded by a professional jealousy eager to smear his character, More could not clear himself at a stroke by naming the real author. If he had, the charges against him of personal immorality would have appeared in their irrelevance to the real issues. He took the principal way left to him. He denied the authorship and produced evidence to help show that Milton deliberately lied on that score, and supplied responsible testimonies clearing him of theological and moral aberrations. He further argued the improbability of his having written the Regii Sanguinis Clamor. And he exposed the vulnerable spots of Milton revealed in the Defensio Secunda. Composed partly during 1653, his reply was entitled Alexandri Mori Ecclesiastae & Sacrarum Litterarum Professoris Fides Publica, contra Calumnias Ioannis Miltoni (The Hague, 1654). The printer was Adrian Vlaeq.

More frankly admits that his friends had warned him against entering a contest with Milton whom, he says, they considered a master of mudslinging and falsehood, an artist of slander who would never quit.¹⁴² Because, perhaps, of those clergymen who had vouched for him in his turbulent career, More feels that through him the ministry and the Church are being attacked and brought into disrepute.¹⁴³ Milton is, moreover, disgracing the Reformed Churches, weakening the faithful, and furnishing the Papists with welcome ammunition.¹⁴⁴ Consequently, in making his reply, More will temper his style so as not to descend to the filth of Milton's attack.¹⁴⁵ Flatly denying the authorship of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, More repeatedly accuses Milton not only of lying but also, in the face of strong evidence to the contrary, persisting in his falsehood.¹⁴⁶ What if the real author, he asks, were unknown or dead? The greatest injury has nonetheless been done to him. "At vivit auctor, & valet, ignotus mihi de facie, compluribus autem bonis notissimus, quorum ego fretus conscientia publicum istud mendacium toto passim libello tuo serpens justissima detestatione prosequor," More reveals.¹⁴⁷ Furthermore, Milton well knew, says More, that another had written Regii Sanguinis Clamor; he had been warned.¹⁴⁸ There had been the responsible letter of the ambassador Nieuport, and a protest by Duraer.¹⁴⁹ Furthermore, Milton could easily have learned that the Latin style of Regii Sanguinis Clamor differed very strongly from that of More's works, he avers; and it did not agree with his known way of life to meddle in another's quarrel, or to attack someone without provocation. Indeed, "adeo meum ab hoc dicendi genere, ita ut dicam, gladiatorio abhorruisse semper ingenium, ut ne Regium quidem defensorem [Salmasius] in eo probaverim unquam, quod tam illustrem causam ageret convitiando."¹⁵⁰

What of the Dedication, with its tasteless reference to Milton's blindness? We know that Du Moulin had not approved of this epistle.¹⁵¹ More declares that he had not known of Milton's blindness until he read of it in the Defensio Secunda, and had intended the comparison to a blinded Cyclops only "ad animum."¹⁵² As to Milton's abuse of him as an adulterer, More points out how shrivelled the Defensio would be with these charges removed, "Quam bella perissent, quam florida & fere dixi Floralia dicta?"¹⁵³

For the unsympathetic reader, Milton had, in the Defensio Secunda, exposed himself to charges of monstrous egotism. With some justice, More took full advantage of this. In the book, More told Milton "tu tibi ostendendus eras, ne superbires insolentius, & importune cristas erigeres, tibi plaudens, te ipse amans sine rivali."¹⁵⁴ Milton only bothered to answer Regii Sanguinis Clamor, More asserts, because of attacks on him. The results? In the Defensio, the English people are merely an appendage of Milton:

Clamori etiam credo pepercisses, nisi tuum propriè nomen insectaretur. Nam privatas quidem injurias, ut Christianus es, acriter & implacabili animo persequeris; hoc rei caput est; populus accessio. In hac ipsâ Defensione secundâ tui an populi, quoties pro populo dicis, tua languet, debilitatur, jacet oratio Gallica nive frigidior; quoties pro te vel de te, quod facis haud paulò saepius, tota tumet, ignescit, aestuat. Nec immeritò Defensio pro populo secunda dicitur, quam pro te perpetuo, praecedit, longè majori sollicitudine accurata.¹⁵⁵

Milton had deceived the public also, for "honesto defensionis nomine, praetextis, quas duo utranque propemodum in opusculo tuo paginam faciunt, scelus in me tum, & scriptas à te proprias laudes tuas."¹⁵⁶

Milton's lofty digressions also draw some acid--and well-aimed--comments from More. Sporting with the panegyric to the Swedish Queen, he remarks that "Nesciebat Christina te sibi esse tam familiarem."¹⁵⁷

Milton's sermon to Cromwell draws the withering comment:

Quae quidem omnia spiritus tibi tam altos induerunt, ut proximus à primo censeri concupiveris, adeoque celsissimo Cromvello celsior appareas interdum; quem sine ulla honoris praefatione familiariter appellas, quem specie laudantis doces, cui leges dictas, titulos circumscribis, munia praescribis, consilia suggeris, & si secus fecerit minas etiam ingeris. Illi arma & imperium concedis, ingenium tibi togamque vendicas. Is solus magnus est, appellandus, inquis, qui res magnas aut gerit, ut ille, aut docet, ut Miltonus de divitiis, aut dignè scribit, ut Miltonus idem pro populo, bis magnus.¹⁵⁸

More had been attacked for both his personal character and theological views. He seeks to clear both by a series of official testimonials, and their confirmations, by the Church and Senate of Geneva.¹⁵⁹ Given in both French and Latin versions, and dated 1648, the documents leave a convincing impression. Since they dwell more on the regularity of More's theology than on his character, one might be prone, if his view is colored by Milton, to consider this suspicious. But this emphasis gains its proper perspective, and is favorable to More, when one recalls that during these years the mania for orthodoxy was at its height at Geneva.¹⁶⁰ Running ceaselessly through Reformed documents, from the cruel ardor of the Genevans to the plaintive nonconformity of Lewis Du Moulin, the word orthodoxy becomes almost a magic guarantee. As Geneva amply shows, to deviate could be to die.¹⁶¹

Confronted with More's wholesale denial of the authorship of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, Milton caused further inquiries to be made in the hopes of strengthening the evidence for his accusations. Vlacq, the publisher of Clamor, had been roundly attacked by Milton in the Defensio Secunda; and with an eye to both his own defense and profit, had published at The Hague in 1654 a reprint of Milton's Defensio bound up with the first edition of the Fides Publica of More. The volume was entitled Joannis Miltoni Defensio Secunda Pro Populo Anglicano . . . Accessit Alexandri Mori Ecclesiastae . . . Fides Publica, Contra calumnias Ioannis Miltoni Sourrae . . .¹⁶² Vlacq supplied preliminary matter which backed up More's denial of authorship. In his "Typographus Pro Se-Ipso," he reveals that

Autor istius Tractatus [Clamor] mihi adhuc incognitus est, utpote qui nomen suum suppressere voluit, sicuti ipse in praefatione sua ibi testatur. Miserat autem Exemplar manuscriptum D. Claudio Salmasio, eique ejus editionem commendaverat, cum quo procul dubio, antea amicitia ipsi quaedam intercesserat, cui comoda occasione, juxta ac

Regiae causae, gratificari voluit.¹⁶³

Vlaeq also recounted how he had informed Samuel Hartlib two years before that More was not the author, and quoted in Latin translation a reply from Hartlib, dated 29 October 1652, accepting the statement by Vlaeq.¹⁶⁴ There were, on the other hand, commonly accepted reports in Holland attributing the book to More.¹⁶⁵ But such well-informed men as Nicholas Heinsius and Isaac Voss understood that Regii Sanguinis Clamor had been written by an Englishman, transmitted through Salmasius, and put out by More.¹⁶⁶ The information which Milton eventually accepted agreed with this to the extent that More had been the editor of Clamor, signed the Dedication, and, partly at least, overseen the publication. Did Milton yet know that Du Moulin was the real author? Since there is no reason to believe that either man lied, it would seem that More's reported delation to Milton came at a later time.

As it was, Milton sought finally to crush More with Joannis Miltoni Angli Pro Se Defensio Contra Alexandrum Morum Ecclesiasten, Libelli famosi, cui titulus Regii sanguinis clamor . . . authorem rectè dictum (London, 1655). The once-exalted defense of a whole nation has now shrunk to a duel of personal abuse, and in the Pro Se Defensio Milton takes nearly the only course left to him. He accepts the fact that More put out the book and signed the offending Dedication, and seeks to twist this into responsibility for everything said in the rest of the book, including the most pungent sections.¹⁶⁷ The Dedication's reference to the Cyclops is insignificant compared to the attack made on Milton in Chapter One and the verses appended to Clamor.

Whether Milton made an attempt to find who wrote the rest of the book, we do not know; but it seems unlikely, for, after having gone so far in the Defensio Secunda, Milton labored to save his own credit by fastening full guilt on Alexander More. His legalistic interpretation is forced, and throws the entire matter out of perspective.

To support his portrait of More as a scoundrel, Milton attacks the testimonial letters from Geneva, including one by the aged Diodati, as being outdated and obtained on condition that More leave the city.¹⁶⁸ Milton seeks to strengthen his case further by extracts from two letters, one anonymous and the other from Duraer, dated 1654 and giving More an odorous character.¹⁶⁹ Milton's grim refusal to give More a fair chance may be seen in the fact that he preferred his private informations to any reconsideration of the matter even when the Dutch ambassador intervened.¹⁷⁰

In reply to the Pro Se Defensio, More published a Supplementum Fidei Publicae (The Hague, 1655), which contained seventeen testimonial letters and documents ranging from 1648 to 1654. The net impression one gets from them is the almost complete vindication of More from the aspersions of Milton. Perhaps the most striking declaration is that of the magistracy of Amsterdam ("Consules & Rectores") flatly denying Milton's charge that More had been reduced to a professorship of Greek, which would soon be taken from him. The testimonial speaks in the highest terms of More's learning, professional zeal, and personal life.¹⁷¹ As to Milton's charges that he had been barred from the pulpit at Amsterdam, More produces a letter from the Church there showing quite otherwise.¹⁷²

Shortly after the Supplementum, Milton published a Responsio which adds little but sarcasm and more abuse.¹⁷³ Thereafter, the controversy lapsed until the Restoration saw publication of Salmasius's reply to Milton, and permitted Du Moulin openly to acknowledge his authorship of Regii Sanguinis Clamor.

With the Restoration, the principals in the Salmasian Controversy had gone their several ways, and the occasional appearance of their partisan works seemed a curiosity in a new age interested in Popish Plots, New Science, old witches, and royal mistresses. Salmasius had been in his grave nearly seven years. Still accompanied by pride and controversy, Alexander More had been called in 1659 to the great temple at Charenton, where Pierre Du Moulin once preached as Casaubon disapproved; and died there in 1670.¹⁷⁴ Meantime, now a canon of Canterbury and a Royal chaplain, Dr. Peter Du Moulin republished in his volume of Latin poems his Ode to Salmasius and lines on Milton, and had the last laugh on both Milton and More. With the clamorous voice of controversy stilled, and all passion spent, Milton had learned wisdom, and sought through his greatest poetry to possess a paradise within him, happier far than when he had demeaned his supreme genius to hiss an itinerant clergyman, or hymn a wandering Queen.

Not only did Du Moulin have the last laugh, but he was also one of the few who profited directly from the publication of Regii Sanguinis Glamor. As a preacher of recognized ability, he was chosen to deliver the funeral sermon on 17 October 1672 for Dr. Turner, the Dean of Canterbury, his friend and superior. Du Moulin then illustrated the Dean's kindness to the clergy by a personal anecdote, telling how, when "the most Reverend Archbishop Juxon made some doubt whether he should confirm me in the possession of Adsham by a new Collation, this peerlesse friend of mine [Turner], shewed him that he could not in honour do otherwise; putting in his hands the true and honourable account which I had given to the world of his rarely virtuous behaviour in assisting our late holy King in his martyrdom, and in his trials for his sake after his death."¹⁷⁵ A printed marginal note specifies Regii Sanguinis Glamor as the work wherein Juxon was so portrayed.¹⁷⁶

An echo from the past, however, might occasionally be heard, to remind men of the controversy which in some ways tolled the bell for Protestant humanism. The Restoration itself witnessed publication of Salmasius's almost forgotten reply, Claudii Salmasii ad Johannem Miltonum Responsio, Opus Posthumum (London, 1660).¹⁷⁷ The work could scarcely add anything to the late scholar's reputation. Whereas the Defensio Regia in proving the King's execution a crime and discrediting the Puritan cause had occasionally risen to some breadth of view, the Responsio merely repeats the earlier arguments about Divine Right. In a sustained tone of dreary petulance, it adds a vituperation of Milton too tasteless to be amusing, and too heavy to carry a point. By incessantly referring to himself in the third person, Salmasius produces an effect of dampened vanity which weakens his authorities' prestige. If the Defensio Regia is long, the Responsio ad Miltonum is formless, collapsing after 304 pages in the middle of his third chapter of abuse for Milton and the Puritans. Occasionally, however, there are some points which Tories might use against Whig theories of popular sovereignty.¹⁷⁸

This literary cadaver drew at least one further attempt at lurid public exhibition. Joseph Jane, who in 1651 had published his nearly incoherent answer to Eikonoklastes--the Eikon Aklastos The Image Unbroken--reissued it in 1660 as a purported translation of Salmasius's reply. It added an engraved portrait of Charles I, a new title page, and a dedication to Charles II. The title page gave an idea of how Milton looked to fervid Royalists in the year 1660--Salmasius His Dissection and Confutation of the Diabolical Rebel Milton, in His Impious Doctrines of Falshood, Maxims of Policies, and destructive Principles of Hypocrisie, Insolences, Invectives, Injustice, Cruelties, and Calumnies against his Gracious Sovereign King Charles I. Made legible for the satisfaction of all Loyal and Obedient Subjects . . .¹⁷⁹

On such a raucous note died the Salmasian Controversy. With it had passed away much of Protestant humanism, as the learned eloquence of past generations coarsened into the jargon of this literary huckster. The great issues of politics and religion which had agitated the Channel nations, and which had been the subject of lordly debate by Pierre Du Moulin and Cardinal Bellarmine, were to be shaped still further by three revolutions into modern theories of representative government. But the Protestant community which had expressed these issues through its synthesis of Christian and classical learning, held together by the Reformed Religion, was disintegrating. The new era drew away from that common intellectual and spiritual discipline shared by Salmasius and Milton, by the Casaubons and the Du Moulines. Scholasticism and Divine Right would soon be replaced by New Science and popular government. It is an irony of fate that the future should have been welcomed, in their different ways, by John Milton and his secret adversary, Peter Du Moulin.

REGII SANGVINIS CLAMOR AD COELVM

ADVERSVS

PARRICIDAS ANGLICANOS

By

Dr. Peter Du Moulin

THE TRANSLATION

As the basis for the translation of Regii Sanguinis Glamor ad Coelum offered here, I have used my own duodecimo copy of the book, checking the Latin text against two other editions to correct typographical errors. Aside from printer's mistakes, there is no difference in the matter of the book in these editions.

Regii Sanguinis Glamor appeared in at least three editions in 1652, all printed by Adrian Vlacq at The Hague. A so-called "Editio secunda" was brought out at The Hague in 1661, reflecting a temporary revival of interest in the Salmasian controversy following the Restoration. I have not had access to this copy, which is in the British Museum. Whatever changes it might make in contents of the book, however, would not materially affect any statements made in the monograph accompanying this translation, for Milton used one of the 1652 editions as the basis for his reply in the Defensio Secunda.

It seems likely that Milton may have employed what was apparently the first of the 1652 editions--a quarto printed with some care by Vlacq. It is a volume comprising preliminary matter and 172 pages of text. For collation, I have used the copy in the University of Illinois Library. As the book attracted notice, it was printed in duodecimo size at least twice. I have collated two such editions: my own, which is the same as the one in the University of Illinois Library. Aside from the title page and preliminary matter (the Dedication to Charles II and the epistle Lectori Christiano"), it is 189 pages in length. This volume is easily identified by the misspelling Paricidas on the title-page and a badly scrambled Latin sentence on pp. 122-123. Evidently printed after this volume was the second duodecimo mentioned, which I used in The Newberry Library, Chicago. Though it corrects numerous mistakes and the muddled sentence of the foregoing volume, it introduces a mistake of its own on the title-page: the place of publication is misspelled Hagae-Comitvn. This edition reduces the book's length to a more economical 148 pages (excluding preliminary matter).

To judge from the glaring errors of the first duodecimo, the misprint on the title-page of the second, and the extreme competence of Alexander More as a Latinist, More's editorship of Regii Sanguinis Glamor must have ended with production of the initial quarto.

In any event, the mutual corrections provided by the three editions used ^{have?} has, I believe, provided an accurate Latin text on which to base this translation.

The Royal Blood's

O U T C R Y

TO

H E A V E N

Against the English

PARRICIDES.

T H E H A G U E :

From the Press of ADRIAN

VLAC. M. DC. LII.

To Charles II,
By Grace of God
of Great Britain,
France and Ireland
King,
Defender of the Faith, &c.

A spectacle to be seen by men and angels, my Lord, is shown by the grievous calamity of your Kingdoms, which, bereft of legitimate rulers, have come into the sacrilege of Parricides and (lacking fit terms, we use Tertullian's word) into the power of "Deicides." I say "the calamity of your Kingdoms," not yours personally--except as you account all your peoples' sufferings nothing impersonal. Indeed, when we examine this universal Stage, men's judgments are still as remarkably varied as their faces, nor do all value the same thing. Some complain of the Fates' envy, "call Gods and Stars cruel," bawl of their empty hopes, and behave poorly when ejected from fortunes, driven into exile, and forced to seek different lands. Others herein better observe some hidden force that whimsically crushes men's affairs, or rather the rod of Divine will by whose disposal all estates are governed. But meanwhile they never gaze without tears on friends, kinsmen, wife, or offspring. Others, after considering personal gains beside, in the death of your Parent of blessed and immortal memory curse only the crime accomplished, unpardonable, and unheard-of since man's creation. And some are deeply moved by your misfortunes. But when I view this Drama more closely, though no man lives more eager for your happiness, I confess that your peoples, bound with horrid tyranny's iron yoke, are well mourned indeed, and think one ought not grieve immoderately at your mishaps. They, they ought to grieve, who dumbly looked on at laws silent among arms, rabble-rousing Furies girt with the sword, God's worship ruined, rascality the law, right perverted to wrong, and nameless dolts, frauds, and peasants bestriding them instead of finest Princes; and their "faces pallor white does mark, and shattered minds are dazed." At their mischances, my Lord, you also grieve with us assuredly more than at your own. For why did your ill Fortune pluck away anything, except that if she had not, you would not trample on her, that is, triumph so magnificently? Gold, gems, crown, scepter—all are tinsel; kingly badges, not Royalty. But she took not away the sacred unction, the Divine character, the imprinted image of the Most High, or your heavenly nature at which we marvel. She took not away your peoples' hearts, wherein you reign more truly than if otherwise you ruled a hundred Britains; nor that mind, King of itself under God, which thus reigns more widely than if governing many worlds. Your misfortunes have taken nothing from you so far that they indicate little else to be hoped. You have a courage already well versed in danger; a virtue not put on in boasts or made of compliments, but attested by realities; and a judgment not artificially polished up in retirement, but trained out of doors under God's own discipline. And at least you gain from your traitorous enemies this valuable fruit, that you are wrestling in that arena where formerly David and recently Henry the Great your Grandfather long struggled hard, and finally brought to managing their Kingdoms (which they regained from thieves) a mind adequate to its destiny. Anxiously watching at the prison doors, O King, while you revolve so many misfortunes and undertake so many labors like theirs, we long (as is our zeal for you and yours) and expect (as is our confidence in God) that you will obtain from God the same result as they. I say no more—all men more knowing of human affairs and not ignorant of the slipperiness of a resplendent Court or flattering Fortune's baits will avow this with me. God set you apart from the Princely mob (for even the loftiest estate has its mob) lest any Siren bewitch you. And though your happy Genius had avoided every rock, when, pray, would you have touched this port whither the storm brought you? You probably would never have attained it, and to your sufferings you owe it that you seriously learned Philosophizing. Marvel not, my Lord; for by "Philosophizing" and reposing as in a quiet harbor I mean this: not to indulge in sad labor of foolishness, or with sluggish effort to emit tuneful trifles of vain burblings; but to ascertain by real experiments the plan of the changing world, the condition of mortals, the changes of Kings and politics, the utter vanity of all man's things, hanging by how thin a thread. All these you certainly must have learned; and were that outstanding ability not in you, yet you could not ignore such oft-repeated lessons impinging on every sense. You have not greeted but embraced this wisdom; you have not touched it to your lips, but quaffed it, and drink on—you are going to be no less learned than your other, very learned Royal Grandfather, who tried and tested whatever he securely beheld in peaceful tranquility from his mental eminence; and "through varied trials and dangers manifold," perceived by a kind of searching. Personally, I judge that he who said Kingdoms would at last be happy when Kings philosophized should only be understood thus concerning doctrine not obscurely loquacious but effectively penetrating the heart (which the guilty teach and Kings hardly learn save by mistress Experience), that by the example of the King and Lord of Kings (who "learned through what he suffered") we may acquire that holy joy of the Author to the Hebrews. Immortal God! How many books, sleepless nights, tutors, and years you would need to learn what, drained for more speedily certain result, you have from one volume of your Kingdoms. But now let us suppose none of your actual sufferings befell you, that happily flourishing you sat on your ancestral thrones. Who knows whether you would then be such as you now appear, or ever such as you someday promise to be? Were I minded to indict war as a sin and discuss virtue, there would not be leisure. Though you were the bravest, there would have been no occasion to explain fortitude. Nor would we now have your memorable example which blazed forth in that battle God allowed to be unfavorable lest with your hand you press forward too much when, with the enemy forces intact but yours shattered (this we have from eyewitnesses), you dashed, amidst a band of a few followers, like a thunderbolt through the enemy troops, your sword driving all back; when you cast your men into great anxiety for your life, and transfixed the amazed enemy with admiration of such great, youthful valor. Nor would we have that sign or miracle of Divine Providence (certainly marking paternal rather than personal care), that God's own hand delivered you from the Lions' mouth--or rather, the Wolves'; and from entangling snares, the selfsame God freed you, as if descended from a machine and not by human aid or artful guidance, a "woman Leader of the deed." It was almost worth losing the victory for you to obtain this proof of divine love. I am prompted to hope it may be that this God will preserve you--so wonderfully saved from the Hell-hounds' very jaws--for great things, you whom even as he has cast down for this, he shall exalt. Meanwhile, O King, waste not these evils. Think how you stand with Him who wishes you to owe all to Him, not to fortune of birth or ancestors or your nobility; that you might be rightly what you are called, "King by Grace of God," he denied you victory but not life, that you should reign someday, not by your own struggles, but through Him. Therefore use hateful fortune by bearing well her excesses, despising her mad fits, as you are beloved of God, guarded by Angels, by all men (I exclude those butchers--they are Demons, not men) acknowledged and hailed as King, and thus seen also wiser and consecrated by your very woes. This way have gone the Princes of Christian name; this is the way prepared to Eternal life. This field your δεδυμένος Parent trod; had all flowed according to his considered wish, had he lived peacefully, had he gone to his fate like a lively boon-companion as you closed your eyes, he would not live today in all good men's mouth and heart throughout the world; nor would he have left both by deeds and deathless writings so many clear-cut signs of patience, perseverance, and piety to go down in History. Let the generations not only wonder at, but praise him; let us account his memory of real value, not just honor it (as we do) with the greatest veneration. Of this veneration this book is witness as long as it avenges the Royal blood with vigorous, spirited eloquence; this book, O King, we are going to dedicate to you if you will permit. And the Author, a notable Man of uncommon ability who suppresses a name quite well-known and long assiduous for your Royal house, will readily approve this. After these preludes, and elegant ones too, a terrifying trumpet he will blow, that θαυμασιος Salmasius, who has no peer or second in the whole world of sciences and letters, who brought to your Majesty's cause stupendously infinite learning joined to heavenly genius. It is a work eternal and loftier than the royal site of the Pyramids, though some scoff and carp at what they hardly understand. But how much more wisely and favorably do the greatest Lawyers of your Britain react, who cannot marvel enough that a Frenchman who had never foreseen that such would become his province thus surprisingly clarified English affairs and their deepest recesses: laws, decrees, treaties, documents, and acts many centuries old; and whatever in them is hardest to unfold, he grasps and explains so intelligently that he seems never to have done anything else. But soon he personally both will curb the Theons' mouth with another attack he is composing against the Rebels, and will hand us Milton for chastisement as he deserves,

A Monster horrid, shapeless, huge, and blind

---although not huge, really; for than him there is none thinner, more bloodless, or more shrivelled of the gnats that injure less the more they bite. You will be delighted to see your Hero rending that disgrace to human kind, and "hoisting Antaeus afar from the earth." And now is the opportune time for this, when our hearts and speech are likewise free, and in our Belgium there are both presses and powers against those cancers on the world, those monsters, which prey on our ships regardless of Religion and international law, fatten on widows' and orphans' blood, and as they are soothed with funerals, bare their teeth, growl, and prophesy all the more madly:

nor any fouler Pest

And wrath of Gods arose from Stygian waves.

What like this was ever against us, what indeed! Rather, what did your best, most wise ancestors fail to name harshly and unkindly? They dealt as peacefully, liberally, and humanely with the Federated Provinces, as these do in the manner of fierce, barbarous, rabid Tigers. For these Provinces I might desire nothing more freely than for them to complete this war as easily and happily as Salmasius will overcome Milton. This, just as παροικιδες, I believe, posterity will enjoy. But this Epistle must be finished and signed, against my wish, at some place or other, certainly not too far from what I have just written. May Christ the Most High restore, not the throne to you, but you to the Ancestral throne, O pitied of Your peoples and the Belgians; and may he cause you to realize more and more that you are God's care. Farewell, and live in your faith, O King unconquered by evils and thus also dearest to God--unless, like the trees for the forest, you take the Gospel for words and terms.

Your Majesty's

Most Devoted

A. Vlac.

To the Christian

Reader

Because of the most Wise and Pious King's murder, the most heinous of all crimes since Creation,

So great a fear of sudden ruin quite Confounds mankind, the world's in utter fright.

The minds of European Nations are aroused for thoroughly investigating the whole affair. Especially have our French professing the Reformed Religion, not only dismayed by the horrible deed but burdened with unfair reproach for it, labored mightily to understand the Parricide, the Parricides, and the entire matter from the beginning. By this inquiry they will clearly find from the conspiracy's start many things otherwise constituted than they had believed from, indeed, the conspirators' own word.

Now I have enjoyed such familiarity with Englishmen of better note that I might dare say I know these monstrous men spawned by Hell for this hideous crime inside and out; and that I clearly perceive England's present condition more comprehensively than one unskilled in English and strange to British shores could expect to do. My English friends easily persuaded me to suppress my name, for I, unworthy of glory, desire no recognition from this trifle; but I only seek to protect God's glory, which the English Parricides supremely wrong by covering their crimes with God's word and (as the World notes with revulsion) masking absolutely loathesome crimes with a most foul, hateful mask of piety.

For historical chronology, I have been greatly indebted both to other Writers and especially to the View of Recent Commotions in England, compiled by an obviously judicious Man, whoever he is. For though I am not writing History, yet insofar as I raise The Royal Blood's Outcry to Heaven, the weight of the crime could not be urged before God and men without some account of the evil committed.

I thought this outcry indeed should be renewed after great Men and raised again now almost three years after the crime's commission, lest the assassin's affairs, going (alas!) too well, and delayed divine justice somewhat habituate weak thinkers to the crime. Here is the patient trust of the Saints. Let all pious men drink in that lesson of profound wisdom, Ecc. 5, 8: "If you see oppression of the poor and perversion of law and justice in a province, marvel not at the will of God; for the Highest, supreme above even these, stands guard; yea, the Highest is far above these." For things unjustly done by second causes are justly done by the first cause, whose secret judgments and marvelous ways shine forth, a light from darkness and glory from men's wickedness.

And this saying, indeed divinely given, enjoins silence on reason objecting to the good fortune of bad tyranny, but not on prayers. Nay, God's love rejoices us as we mourn under this reproach to the Gospel and Church; and a most bitter sense of the injury done to his holy name compels jointly to raise prayerful hands and burning groans to God and with the Royal Blood to cry out to heaven. Were there indeed no men for this duty, yet the hallowed gore will cry from the earth; and until it shall have drawn just vengeance from heaven, night and day it will continually cry, "Arise, God of vengeance, O mighty God of vengeance, arise."

I N D E X

To the Chapters of this Book

Chapter

- I. Occasion of this Writing and Summary
- II. The Parricides' Crimes against his Royal Majesty
- III. The Parricides' Crimes against the People
- IV. The Parricides' Injuries to the Church
- V. The Parricides' Injuries to God
- VI. The Parricides' Injuries to all Kings and Peoples
- VII. The Parricides' Injuries to the Reformed Churches
- VIII. That all pious men should attack this parricide with the utmost severity, and raise the Royal Blood's Outcry to Heaven

THE ROYAL
BLOOD'S OUTCRY
TO HEAVEN
Against the English Parricides

CHAPTER I

Occasion of this Writing and Summary

Although the Majesty of Kings has been sacred to all ages, as being the image of Divinity, the people's safety, and the life of laws; and their very injuries in silence and patience venerated as heavenly wraths, as all rights of Majesty or citizens' duties have taught: yet always there have been subjects' arms hostile to Lords, and treachery, poisonings, parricides. Consequently, few in the series of Emperors and Kings have passed away their last day by a bloodless death, and he rightly showed the rulers' lot who, over the head of Damocles banqueting among golden vessels, harmonies, and fawning courtiers, from a thin hair suspended a drawn sword.

These trials of Kings are trite, common, and from the middle of fortune's heap. Nor will Kings' estate be safer so long as men become perverse from hate, wrath, greed, lust for power, and a pretence of liberty, forever fatal to peoples, destined to end in the tyranny of the few and slavery of all.

This age suffers other Punishments, other Furies also. Our world gazes on dismayed, and our generation groans that to it are reserved evil prodigies never known before. After so many Kings, God's Vicegerents, had been killed in battle, poisoned, or purposely assassinated, it only remained for the Most Venerable King to be dragged before a false show of public judgment. A King, I say, possessing (if anyone ever did) full rights of Majesty and tracing his line of legitimate succession back ten centuries and more, was arraigned for treason and tried as a defendant before his people's very dregs, who had usurped the Judgeship; was condemned, and at last (Woe, faith of God and men!) publicly executed, as the whole realm watched and almost cried blood with tears and expired in sobs at its King's severed head.

This monstrous crime utterly confounded us of other lands, and at its rumor we were completely horrified--not by the horror merely that, catching the unprepared at sudden events, soon relaxes with deeper knowledge; nor the grief that, bitter at first (as in the death of dearest parents or children), lessens with time and sound advice. For indeed as we see deeper into the affair, as we more thoughtfully weigh all the horrible crime's circumstances, the more forcibly horror smites us, the sharper grief burns--not piercing as at the start, but torturing. For our disposition to evil follows nature in that it strengthens by continuance as the crime of parricide progresses into custom, doctrine, and finally an external likeness of the choicest piety.

For this huge evil men's tongues have no name, because it is a "monster not of our race or blood," and ought to derive its name from its parents, who besetting one man in troops would say, "Our name is Legion because we are many," such a varied, manifold, and almost infinite Hydra of prodigious evils is seen in one crime. Yet, since the crimes are so implicated they hide each other, one would hardly be λεπτολογος enough in calling this a "Crime of Majesty." To the most immense of all Parricides are added horrible Sacrilege, perversion of all laws, violation of divine and human laws, extinction of nature, the disgrace of Justice, the murder of three Kingdoms at a stroke, destruction of the Church, trampling of Religion, world-wide reproach to the Gospel, and the universal subjection of all Reformed believers to the hostile axes of their lords. And, to cap it all, a horrible injury is offered to the Most High, to whose glorious name this whole play of foulest crimes is acted out amidst prayer and fasting with a pretense of Divine inspiration and splendid show of piety. Finally, all the crimes Hell ever produced joined together to effect this crime.

To it, the crime of the Jews crucifying Christ was nothing, whether you compare their intention or the crime's effect: for the Apostle himself testifies for the Jews that they would never have crucified the King of glory had they known him. Yet by portents these men knew, more than enough for their condemnation, what man they violated--their own legitimate King. Then, from Christ's death came much prosperity for the Church, great glory arose to God. But with its finest King, the Church of England has been finished with the same ax and neighbors brought into extreme disgrace and danger, while all

Reformed believers are charged with the same fatal madness that seized a few falsely assuming the name "Reformed."

Yet I doubt not that glory will rise hence to the Most High. For God, with His marvelous ways, usually gains this from its contraries. But I might dare assert that nothing more against God's glory has arisen since creation, nothing that has cast a fouler stain on holy Truth. For since by their flawed intellect men's sins are usually blamed on doctrine, it also happens that this huge dyos (I shudder to mention) is protected by Gospel doctrine, and perpetrated to the "defense" of the Reformed Religion.

This enormous injury stabs to their very vitals all those Reformed to the truth, especially the French and Dutch. Everywhere there are tears, wails, assemblies, and the freest indignation against the evil Parricides, plainly as if not a foreign King but fortune, fame, and safety had been lost. Hence come so many justly enraged books by learned men who have only Religion in common with English affairs; so much could Zeal for God's house and love of Religion do. And more would have appeared if all had pressed handy, and good men everywhere enjoyed like freedom of thought and speech. Never did Poetic fire blaze with livelier flames or thunder with harsher curses! But an unrestrained, ample discourse, a robust, learned defense, are needed by wounded Religion, the Church arraigned for a strange crime, and the sacred Majesty of Kings placed, by impious new example, under subjects' judgment and hangman's ax.

And so the Prince of letters, Claudius Salmasius, stepped forth and undertook this defense, a Champion worthy of such Clients. To him, Kings will owe, while the world stands, their claims to dignity and safety, as will the Church and Religion; every age will praise such merit of this remarkable man. Samuel Bochart, that other great glory of our time, trod the same way with a book briefer indeed, but good God, how learned and sinewy with reasoning! Why should I recall Vincent, Herald, Porée, and other judicious men who fortunately descended into this arena? But Great Salmasius quite removed the design of the English crime and dragged those Hell-hounds into hated daylight. He is as much esteemed for intellect, learning, and nearly infinite experience as he prevails in fame and public admiration. Utterly applying himself to the Royal Defense, he drew forth the inmost store of sacred and secular Law for this golden work.

At these things all will marvel, even those peering dully at such sublime brilliance of erudition. Most outstanding for me is that frank vigor of aroused speech, whereby he crushes the evil Parricides as with a thunderbolt. Offended Piety gave eloquence sinews, and inspired indignation freely elevated lofty discourse still further. Never did the Great Man rise higher, never more Salmasius. But I spare praises, for that Man, even more devout than learned, sought not his but God's glory.

The Parricides rage at rumor of such a work--not upon reading it; for how many of those wretches understand Latin? They kept hearing this truly Royal Defense praised by all reports, Salmasius himself to be in high favor, the Princes' Patron to be the Princes' pet and asked over by Sweden's Most August Queen with lavish rewards; and their own Tyranny, built on parricide, to be universally denounced with curses. Therefore these beasts, who propitiated ignorance, sought some hungry Grammataster who would hire out his pen to the parricide's defense. And one was found, who would dare write Latin after a repudiated learning, a truly great hero to oppose Salmasius--John Milton. What doubt is there if this be man, or worm lately come from a dunghill? What to do? Selden was shrugging off the hateful task; the Universities were sterile, zealously purged of learning by them; and any learned men dragging along under their Tyranny drained good sense out of their very learning. So as the unarmed in pressing need of defense even fling mud and dung, these men to whom "madness ministers arms" in their utter want of learned men had seized on Milton and threw that unworthy clod at Salmasius.

Expelled from Cambridge University for his vices, this man is said to have fled disgrace at home and wandered into Italy. Thence, as this rebellion grew, he was recalled by revolutionary hopes to England and lovingly received by the impious faction, for men infamous at home are always most welcome to traitors. Indeed, those despairing of fame and fortune among the honest are hopeful of good credit with the wicked. Now returned, he wrote a Book of Divorce wherein he maintained that any rightly contracted marriage could be dissolved at either partner's decision. Nor was this punished--in a Republic, of course, wherein by criminal wrong they claimed for themselves the absolute liberty of God--unless they attributed this, too, to their own partisans.

Nor did this man made for violation of all laws stop here, for soon he went from dissolution of Marriages to divorce of Kingdoms. When, therefore, the conspirators deliberated about the King's head and many greatly feared such a huge crime, the Hellish gallows-bird wrote them and drove the hesitant to the evil side, especially urging it be done for their own heads, for they or the King must die. Therefore the conference ended, which severed the sacred King's neck with vile ax; we account him the killer who persuaded the crime, who did it. "I have done it indeed," says he, admitting the crime, embracing, protecting, and praising it. This he does in a depraved book called Ikonoklastes, where that foulest murderer insults the holy Spirit of King Charles; this he does in his notorious pages against Great Salmasius, where he paints the most inhumanly wicked parricide the world ever saw with the colors of piety and justice. That such a monster of a man and those parricides like him live--nay, rule--is the greatest argument for God's patience, and exercise for our own. While we await Him who is to crush that old serpent beneath our feet, may He bruise the evil heads of these dragons and someday free his truth and justice from the wrong of irreligious assassins.

What? Are we bound by the duty of Christian patience to bear these wrongs silently, especially we against whom these Tyrants are powerless? This, Milton the Parricides' Champion wishes, who, upon the English daring to mutter under Tyranny, enjoins the laws he violates, that--of course--"they be subject to higher powers" as Paul commands. To Salmasius weighing this most shameful crime by Piety and Justice, he cries out, "What bad interest have you in what the English do among themselves?" He will be remarkably successful, by Jove, if he makes himself and his Masters safe from foreign and domestic enemies both. And of their domestic, we avow that they should not only submit to tyranny but acknowledge its dominion, when there is absolute despair of a legitimate Lord and repeated efforts to bring the Tyrants to Justice have failed. Yea, but the English despair of neither. Milton, however, barely checks foreign protests and pens---perhaps even swords---before Cromwell shall have effected that vow, which he often declared before many witnesses, "that he intended, if God prolonged his life, to overturn all Monarchies and ruin all Kings." He will guard against failing in this protracted effort; let Kings look to their own safety.

Obviously, we are waging war in this cause not with the bared points of swords, but of pens which, perchance, may yet sharpen the swords. And we are contending that this defense does concern those with no English concerns, and that Salmasius has the justest motive for attacking the Parricides with the exerted shafts and sinews of his learned genius. For Englishmen might be thought in this defense to act too bitterly from partisan zeal, and to champion not the cause of justice but their own. But, having no personal motive to pry in a foreign Republic, if the French should freely denounce the veil of piety hiding bloody tyranny and with sharpest rebuke assail the Tyrants, it is fitting for them, when aroused by the injury to dishonored Religion and the Church jeopardized and disgraced, to have taken no account of men but overflowed in this wrath.

Great Salmasius so excelled this task that he alone equals all, leaving no further need for descent into this controversy. For who would wield a paintbrush after Apelles? Certainly I am not so empty-headed as to volunteer help for Salmasius or infringe on a Province undertaken by him. Nor have I taken on the job of asserting the Rights of Kings or defending the August Martyr against parricides; for the Royalist Champion quite completed this Task and to such a great work brought all divine and human laws and an unlimited store of learning. Yet learned and unlearned alike ought to raise the Royal blood's outcry to heaven; those sitting in the best or worst seats equally should exclaim, "Arise, arise, God of vengeance, and avenge this parricide horrible and shameful to the Christian world!"

What of the fact that I undertake to perform what unbecame a great Man? For I hear those fantastic gaspers blustering to Salmasius that whole pages swell with bombastic charges, that he imports arguments dipped in bitterest gall more for emotional attacks than for enlightening discourse; that this is not disputation but brawling; and, finally, that Christians should behave otherwise between themselves, that this vehemence agrees not with Christian mildness. It is therefore worthwhile for me to show that others, whom I vouch to be far more numerous and better than myself, agree with that vehemence of Salmasius.

I affirm, I say, together with all good, prudent men, that one had to do thus with the Parricides, those most foully evil monsters of all; and that his vehemence sins not in excess, but want rather; and that whom he calls Molossian dogs ought to be called Hell-hounds. Salmasius obviously had a whole thesaurus of words, the universal instrument of speech, which he never used with more felicitous brilliance. But the skillfullest knight avails nothing beyond his horse's strength and spirits, nor the greatest Rhetorician beyond the fit aptitude of the tongue whereby, as on a horse, he is conveyed. Words fail, the most plenteous torrent of eloquence subsides under a crime of this size. Nor is it surprising that we have no Latin words to signify a crime unknown to Latium when the Latins had the power to regulate correct speech. One does no better if he calls for help on Greek, Hebrew, or the more recent tongues, for what race would have fitted words to a crime unseen, unheard-of by any nation?--Unless, of course, we imitate the Hebrews, who, if unable to equate word and thing, double that word and call it מְאֵדָה , that is, "measureless evil"; for in this crime we do have indeed evil heaped on evil, accumulated impieties, treasons, and parricides. Nor could Salmasius match this impenetrable mass of crimes with his extensive resources of the richest Latin, alas! too simple for this multiplicity of crime.

Who therefore will accuse Salmasius of "injury" because of this vehemence? Who save a dullard would touch these criminal prodigies without cursing? After so many centuries, nobody reads of Nero's parricide without loathing it at once. But what if it had been committed yesterday, or nearby, or if the parricide had been celebrated with sacrificial rites, and had appeased God with a mother's blood? What, moreover, if upon the pious reader's Religion a great stain had thence been cast, the Church accused of a strange crime, and God himself made a party to the crime? Lo, the World now groans under a weight of evils such as Nero's crime did not impose on consciences. Do the Parricides expect all men's imate sense of justice to be so shocked that no offense will follow this offensive crime? We foreign-born, visibly sensing how Law, Religion, the Church, and lastly our Heads are oppressed with the heaviest disgrace for our adherents: will we so much revere a heathen merit lately begotten of parricide that we are paralyzed by the splendor of so much merit--or reverence for such sanctimony--and dare not even mutter against it? Shall we, forseeth, hear that author's cry, pronounced enough for a command, "What bad interest have you in what the English do among themselves?" Yet what our interest is, they have learned, and shall learn still more--not, I daresay, without their own hurt. And while their deserved crosses and sacks are being prepared for the Parricides, we will satisfy our justest indignation with curses and return upon its impious authors the horrible injury heaped upon Reformed believers.

Nor ought we fear moving emotions at the cost of reason. For a long time now, reason has had its rights in this matter; the Royal Defender finished this task with such rich exactness that nothing could add to such fullness. Since indeed the law is not only written but inborn and drawn from Nature's purest sources, that "it is wrong for subjects to turn against their prince," I personally think too much is conceded the Parricides by arguing with them. Aristotle declares (I. Top. cap. 9) "Not by Reason but Torments must they be taught who doubt whether God should be worshipped and Parents honored.* That Great Genius of reason feels that reason, a sacred thing, is profaned by argumentation with those who have sworn off sanity and extinguished the lights of natural justice in themselves. In the judgment of all, the Royal Defender most excelled when with invincible reasons he demonstrated a matter best known by nature, and confirmed it by divine and human authority, that Royal Majesty is ἀγυπεῖθρον, and nothing is permitted subjects against the sacred heads of Kings. In my own judgment, he did still more what the subject demanded when with clubs he took those men who foreswore manhood, and with bruising heels trampled them as poisonous vipers baneful to human kind. This wrath, this vehemence burning with Zeal for God, is welcome to God and men: it attacks the weak spot of the parricides' cause, and leads those robbers forth to be denounced and stoned by the whole Christian World.

And just as the sacred attack of Phineas ended the sinful Epidemic at Baal-Peor, which the admonitions of Moses could not: this matter has sunk so far that the one hope of checking riotous madness, stubborn against rights of divine and human laws, must be expected from a sacred attack ready to burst into the justest, flaming denunciation, soon even into vengeance of arms.

Should one object falsely that Kings and Commonwealths can regulate with arms only, but anybody can denounce and stir up ill-will at a crossroads, I reply that not everything suits everyone. A mere girl will best a Hercules with her vicious tongue; but so to denounce that the spirits of Kings and Commonwealths become inflamed to a just, angry vengeance against public enemies belongs to our French Hercules, who leads conquered Princes and Peoples in the chains of his speech. This the Royal Defender accomplishes, not because he can swear, but because he is Salmasius; not any crossroads rabbler could do this. "If anything befits Pholoe, it doth not,/ Chloris, quite suit thee."

But I hear those enemies of Kings, and letters as well, in a huff-snuff; and us Bookmongers, why, in your writings you'll twit us as Warmongers whom you ought to run through. I repeat, anybody can use a sword, but very few the pen--and pens whet swords. Try out sometime, you loathesome beasts, what pens can do, what blasts our writings arouse whencesoever, by which the packed phalanxes of traitors are dissolved as if by a heaven-sent thunderbolt: you'll have men to deal with who prefer action to words.

But now they must be satisfied who deem that we sin excessively against Christian meekness by this excess, that we ought not treat Christians so. However, I think it suits Christian meekness, most bitterly to prosecute Parricides who blot out meekness from Religion; as he would say who heard a negligent Prince heaped with praise for goodness, "How will he be good to the good, who is not evil to the evil?" Whoever has reckoned the cruel monstrosities these Hell-hounds have committed does not wish to tell us, "I seek kind words."

I will report a few of many instances of savagery which, besides that against their own King, they displayed against Neighbors and Compatriots.

After the battle of Naseby, all women who had followed their men, fleeing the tyranny of the traitors, were put to the sword in huge numbers.

After the slaughter at Preston, tired of killing and butchery, they starved several thousand Scots to death, imprisoned in grassy pens where with grass and plucked roots they prolonged hunger rather than life for some days.

Others captured in the same battle, both English and Scotch, they sold like beasts of burden to slavers. By these transported as captives to the American Isles and employed on sugar plantations, they were made to do Negroes' work; until, when a great avenger of wrongs assisted them, they shook off the horrible yoke and seized the lush Isle of Barbados from the Tyrants.

To these, add their cruelty to the Presbyterians surviving the battle of Dunbar. They delayed killing them so they would thus linger on in Durham prison so as to realize they were dying. For how few from so many thousands survived that jail? Add, too, the late shambles at Worcester. This noble city, because it had opened its gates to Charles II, its legitimate King, was miserably plundered. Its walls were levelled to the ground, and the soldiery glutted its anger with murders, and its greed with rapine. Neither sex nor age was spared. As for captives taken in the battle, the English, laden with chains, are set apart for the death penalty by the Tyrants and immediately led forth; but the Scots they keep out of doors night and day until, consumed by hunger, frost, and dysentery, they are carried off in whole troops. The pious generosity of the Londoners had freely supplied the naked with clothes, the needy with coin; but such kindness was the robbers' booty, for soon the savage guards robbed the miserable of both clothes and coin. Usually they intercepted even the food sent to the prisoners. After eating their fill, the guards overturned pots full of meat, and when the famished captives picked at the morsels pitched forth in the mud, they were clubbed back and swine invited to the scraps. The more mercifully treated captives are sold to traders to be sent to American workhouses. But few buyers appear, and few survive briefly to be sold, so consumed are they by daily hunger within sight of a wealthy and vainly kind city. And, for variety in their deaths, sixty were placed on a poorly ballasted ship; the anchor once hoisted, the boat capsized and the river swallowed them up.

But cruelty and perfidy were crowned by the utterly shameful murder of the most Illustrious Count of Derby, contrary to a promise made at the battle of Worcester; and even as he was averting this in Parliament, Cromwell, the impious butcher, was promoting it in the army. Such a heinous crime will, perhaps, be avenged someday by the Princes of the French blood Royal, with whom the Count's heroic widow is connected by closest kinship. How small a part, too, is this of the savage deeds wherewith the new Tyranny distinguishes itself? And will anyone confer euphemisms on cruel deeds? Why not, say they, since Christ commands his own to bless all enemies soever? What if the enemies are Christian? Would that they were indeed! Who, to be sure, will believe they have put on Christ who have put off humanity? But whatsoever they finally be, let us bless the men and curse the crimes.

We will sincerely pray for our enemies, and repay them good deeds for evil should they ever come into our power.

Finally, since the Law's second table yields place to the first, if we shall have demonstrated that the Most High God is summoned by this murderous scum to defend horrible crimes; that great infamy for His Gospel is created by damned men; that the foulest stigma is branded on the Reformed church; that by their crime this church is terribly jeopardised; there will be no cause to accuse us of violating charity, if we have asserted God's glory and the good name and safety of all good men against a few robbers. Particularly so, if we shall show that this baneful reproach, heavier than death itself, and not just threatening but (alas!) clinging to our heads, could only be plucked and cast off by this most bitter detestation and vehemence. Certainly none of the Reformed will condemn it, save those who have inspected the matter superficially, or have not what they ought--a sense of their own shame and danger.

It lies upon us, therefore, to demonstrate two things: "What crimes the Parricides have committed at home"; and "What injury is done through these misdeeds to God, Kings, and to all Churches abroad." Thence it will be evident that everybody at home and abroad ought to attack these monsters of crime with words and deeds as strongly as possible and appeal to God the avenger.

We will begin with the very crimes whereby they have violated three principal things at home: the King, the People, and the Church.

CHAPTER II

The Parricides' Crimes against his Royal Majesty

We infringe not on your province, Great Salmasius: You have defended the Royal rights; You have pleaded the Royal cause; who, after you, would dare? You are acting as its Defender, we as its plaintiffs, any reader soever as Judge. Since, therefore, the case is tried in the open court of public right, let me display before my Readers' eyes this horrible tragedy of a crime too public.

One who would recapitulate from the beginning the injuries done to the glorious King and Martyr ought to start with the first year of that unhappy Parliament, when the King, wearied with the most unfair demands, was soon driven from his home even by riots, threats, and finally arms, whilst a mad populace was aroused by a madder Senate that was already flying against Royal authority and Majesty.

Thence (so to speak), the restraints of laws and shamefastness being broken, the torrent of rebellion surged forth and equally flooded three kingdoms with one deluge. In this tidal wave, O Greatest God, thy faith! what have they done--or not done? Tributes, taxes, and Royal crops have been intercepted and turned against their Lord, Citadels captured, the Purse seized, the Fleet occupied, Arms assumed; and those refusing to bear them against their King have, in extreme punishment, served as an example for all those preferring life to conscience, to consent peaceably to the rebellion. Next, as the fortune of war would have it, the Royal Letter-case was captured and divulged and the great Royal seal broken up, so that all could plainly see the Royal Authority was smashed.

The Queen herself, the Royal blood of France, was---O wonderful!--- proscribed and accused of treason, and at last driven into exile; while the King, broken by many battles and having escaped besieged Oxford in disguise, barely got through by-ways and enemy forces, finally to cast himself on the just-as-unfriendly Scots army, like a stag fleeing the dogs into the hunters' nets. Meanwhile, all roads were blockaded, and the Senate decreed that, under pain of immediate death, nobody should harbor the King without at once informing on him. His subjects no more, they stopped calling themselves such in those supremely shameless conditions they forced on the King in his Scotch captivity. Redeemed thence from the Scots, this best of all Kings exchanged masters, not slavery; but was dragged by the English to another imprisonment. And this was the Presbyterians' last power against the King.

Now because I embrace them as our friends, even as I search how to free our dearest brothers from odium for the injuries done that day to their legitimate King, this only occurs to me: that mixed with the greater, Presbyterian part of the Senate was an Anabaptist ferment which from the very start leavened nearly the whole lump, so that many yet did even what they disapproved, for a good end winking at bad means; and that meanwhile the Independents, those craftiest of men, were suggesting that all great public actions have some injustice afterwards compensated by public utility; and it would be very easy, the whole thing finished, to mend at will anything done before with less fitting justice. Thus were the Presbyterians misled, until unawares--and unwilling, too--they carried the business so far that retreat meant reproach.

For Public factions are like ships which, once out on the deep with their passengers aboard, must go not where will directs, but where wind and wave lead; and very few are so determined that they would leave a ship for a skiff, to row against tide and winds--especially if, as they oppose the factious torrent, their property, their very family and life are endangered.

Of course, the more judicious sniffed Anabaptism in that English Parliament the very first year, when laborers and the entire dregs of London came, on summons by the lower house of Parliament, to the upper house, rather as besiegers than pleaders; and that very Lower House sent their demand on to Lords, that "the Chamber of Peers being dissolved, Lords should sit in the House of Commons and they should consolidate the two, so that, with the Commonwealth levelled, they might with preparation go on to introduce parity into the Church" (for the Bishops still remained). If this be not accounted pure Anabaptism, I know nothing. And the thing was done by this model with a success exceeding their prayers: Lords were abolished, Monarchy toppled, and the Republic went over to a parity of Ministers, so that it is evident the same spirit thrived then which eight years later finished the affair with the King's impious parricide.

This poison so horrible, so evident, Faugh! how did so many good men then in the Senate concoct it? Obviously they swallowed it, whether blinded by the heat of contention, or whether some knew not what others did in this most loudly confused of all tumults; or whether--chosen for this purpose--the populace, raging and menacing at the door, exulted the spirits of the very few Independents in Parliament, but broke the others.

However much, therefore, the Presbyterians acted their part in this drama of rebellion, yet to the Independents do the crime's whole first and last act belong. They, before their intentions were clear, breathed ruinous counsels into the Presbyterians; they did everything by their judgment even while the Presbyterians prevailed and seemed to rule. Doubtless, the Presbyterians' plans so excelled in their boldness that they had to make them according to that already done, before the Senate had deliberated whether a thing should be done! For however the Presbyterians sat in greater number in the Senate, yet the Independents were in the Army always more powerful in martial strength and counsel, and finally in number, too; and six years ago this Tyranny was (to use your word, Great Salmasius) a pure "stratocracy." For either soldiers' nods directed Senators' votes, or daring dissenters were unseated by the troops; and late did the miserable Presbyterians learn how unsafe men are, wishing to be wiser than God, who forbids us "to do evil that good may come, and needs not the help of men's crimes to advance his kingdom; nor add we ought to God's glory, steadfastly to be good." Than this fallacy, indeed, Satan has tried no reward more potent to drive good men to the evil part, has advanced no device more certain to topple the Church. Be these things said freely and lovingly to our Presbyterian brothers. Let them know that we neither wrongly assent to their deeds, nor change our love toward them.

Let us quarrel with the Independents, whose rule then truly began when they received the King, taken from the Presbyterians' custody, into theirs, doubtless a freer one at first. The King's children were fetched, his servants admitted, the Camp became a Court, and promise of Restitution was shown him; but meanwhile as King and Cavaliers were salved with such hope and the odium of harshness to the King cast back on Parliament, the army was respected as the King's liberator and the asserter of peace by Londoners and everybody.

Soon, when by these and other ruses, but principally by force and moving up the army, they controlled the citizenry and armory of London, and had made Parliament theirs by expelling and heavily fining the Presbyterians, their hatred of the King, poorly hidden before, suddenly became open. His confinement was closer, access more difficult; throughout the army there were harangues for killing the King, and glowering, hateful guards were chosen for him, practically glaring murder. When, meanwhile, the one who stirred up this anger, Cromwell that basest of bipeds, was most pretending fear for the King's safety and increasing the danger near the King to a greater one—a soldiery rioting, disobeying its leaders, and thirsting for the King's blood—the King fled in this pressing danger and betook himself in the dead of night secretly to the Isle of Wight, there to stay in its well-fortified castle until these storms abated.

This basest tormentor cast fear into this best King, even as he was vexed by a greater fear lest the King retire to London (which, conveyed by a helpful stream, he could have in four hours) and there the citizens become his followers, refusing the new tyranny and hating the army's yoke. Besides, the King's mind had been decided by the amplest promises, which in that last assembly this murderer spared not, equally bland and treacherous in speech, known equally for promises and perfidy, a consummate hypocrite: he seized the King's hand when advanced for him to kiss, cried over it, swore and promised by his and his children's safety not to rest until he had restored the King to his pristine dignity; only let him go yield to this blast, he would soon return with peace and dignity.

The holy King went, therefore, wherever his fate was leading, and confined himself there whence he was nevermore led forth but to his prepared death. Those gallows-birds dared not, in the very center of the realm almost in sight of the capital, decree anything about the King's life, since the state was not yet subdued, the Senate very firm, nor the Army united enough, and the People--aroused by the newest promises of the Leaders--aspired to the King's liberty and their own. Consequently they wished to hold the King in their power, enclosed by the shores of a little Isle, where approach was shut off and custody easy, and his fate could be decided by the judgment of a few.

Why he was not thereupon killed by dagger or poison, their deeds explained later. They wished to destroy not only the King but the Royal name, and to take over the Royal power; therefore he must not die uncondemned. But, as things then were, that scene had not yet docile actors or submissive spectators.

Now entered the Island fortress, the King found the Governor's obedience prompt; but soon, whom he had thought an attendant and friend, he found his keeper, the Senate, already tamed by Cromwell, thus ordering it. Having a looser confinement at first, he writes to the Senate, demanding that peace conditions be negotiated at a conference which he would attend. They, fearing nothing more than peace and conference, send him four conditions which they wish conceded prior to entering a conference. But they wished nothing less than for the King to concede anything, and so they had prepared conditions which he would have to reject.

These were, "that hereafter the King should divest himself of the control of the Militia; that all the King's edicts against Parliament should be void; that all whom he had raised in dignity after his rift with the Senate should be reduced in rank; that Parliament, without awaiting Royal authorization, could assemble at any time soever." This certainly was (as I might say among Logicians) to proceed to the Conclusion itself before the Premisses were settled: for to what purpose were a conference on Royal Rights if the King had ceded all his Rights before its setting up? The Scots Legates, indeed, resisted these conditions with the greatest effort.

Since therefore this miserable choice was left the King, "either to be abdicated by others or to abdicate himself," he preferred dying by another's crime to a death by his own. He replied that "He could not concede those things whereby he would lose the faculty of ruling and protecting his people; he owed the Kingship to his heirs, and would not strip himself and them of it; even if he quite approved these conditions, they would yet be invalid, conceded by a King no wise free, and secured by his seal accorded under duress; as for the rest, conditions which the Conference should treat ought not be concluded before it; that this meet as early as possible, he demanded again in a letter written to this end, which he handed sealed to the Senate's Delegates."

But with what intent the conditions had been sent to the King, the Delegates made clear before moving a foot from the Isle. For immediately they opened the King's Letters to the Senate, saying this was in their instructions. After perusing them, they ordered the King brought into harsher confinement; his old attendants were removed, unfriendly ones installed, the windows barred, and stern watch set up around his cell. And no delay, as Cromwell, that kind asserter of Royal safety and liberty, moved in the Senate that "Hereafter there be no conversation between King and Parliament; no messenger be sent to him, none received from him; that it be illegal for anyone to approach him without the Senate's permission; and he doing otherwise pay the penalty for treason."

But before this monster was thrust upon the Senate, around fifty leading Senators, whom they despaired of being able to draw into such a crime, had been sent out to raise funds for the army. And yet the horrible measure did not easily become law: it was argued from early morn almost to bedtime, until many, tired by delay and consumed by hunger, left, and a few more stubborn fellows, possibly fortified against hunger (as they familiarly said) by their "dessert," sat tight and passed the motion.

And these happened in the Lower Chamber; for the Upper could hardly be brought to such an evil, until, with two Legions sent against the Palace, a few Lords, after many slipped away, were compelled by threats and terror to approve the ordinance. For such merit, six military Tribunes were sent to the Lords and promised on the whole army's word, they would defend all Rights and Privileges of the Upper Chamber. How they did this, we shall soon see.

The infamous Decree was followed by a prolix accusation against the King, circulated by the Senate's authority, and to be read by all clergymen from the pulpit, which sought to justify so direful a deed to the people. And Baissaries were suborned to arouse Schismatics in every county to thank the Senate for such a crime and demand the King's punishment. But the vilest mandate found neither obedience among Ministers of the Gospel, nor, after the Baissaries had scraped together the whole dregs of England, did they accomplish more with their three beggar libels thanking the Senate for the King's wrongful captivity, or demanding his punishment. Nay, the People--even those who had followed the Senate's arms--was thence stirred, as if from Lethargy, through the entire realm with virtually one voice to demand, to urge, that conference with the King be started and the Soldiery discharged. In huge number, nearly all the Counties streamed from deserted boroughs to the doors of Parliament to demand these; until the Senators (who let nothing be demanded from them but what they had specified) by setting the Militia on them slew a great many--suppliants, rustics, unarmed, sighing for peace and liberty. Slain, they were despoiled by the soldiers as if by right of war; the Senate thanked the Militia for such a famous crime.

The other Counties, however, even more remote ones, flocked together in great droves, in just such wise that you had thought that country had migrated into city, other cities into London. Yet the Scots anxiously demanded their King, taking it very ill that they were denied access to their high and mighty Prince. But all sang their song to the deaf: the English were mocked with delay and ambiguities that had befitted a Delphic Oracle; the Scots received with even contempt and threats.

At last trampled patience flared out into fury. England would not bear the yoke of a new and cruel Tyranny, Scotland the injuries of a neighboring race. Everywhere murmurs, groans, and anger already open; and nearly everybody was aroused to avenge the repulse with arms. First, seventeen navy ships deserted the Tyrants; the Scots openly prepared for an invasion; in divers Counties the English fomented secret counsels for war.

But what should I marvel at the more--the Royalists' misfortunes, or their enemies' craft? There were differences of every plan, both of Royalists and Presbyterians (for both would often secretly join forces)--which ruined the Royalists. For anyone who had followed the arms of Parliament easily feigned penitence, joined the Royalists, found out and betrayed the party's plans. Using these tools, the Independents penetrated the Royalists' minds, and forced their unready endeavors (as it were) to abort by premature birth; herein carefully working it so that the Provinces take up arms, not together but separately, that hence they themselves might have, with the pot just on the stove, men ready to suppress the unready; and laboring finally that all who undertook arms should vainly waste their efforts before the Scots invaded, leaving them single units only to manage. All these they ordered so well through pretended deserters that the Royalists apparently had disjoined time and trial so as to hand their enemies an easy victory.

When therefore the members of the Royalist party had been broken at leisure one by one, they gained a major victory, almost bloodless, from them; it being God's will (Whose judgments are hidden, punishments just, and decrees unchanged) that the holy King should fall into criminals' hands, and all that undertook his just defense be involved in equal misfortune. This was not the first time a most just cause lacked a happy outcome. Yet one who has blamed men's injustice will likewise look to the justice of the cause; and many who could not aid the King will appease his ghost with the Parricides' blood.

Naval affairs followed Fortune ashore. For the minds of sailors, having (so to speak) tides reciprocal with their sea, were turned once more to the Senate, following the Count of Warwick, their Admiral and friend, who, after so notable a victory gained for the Senate, was left stuck in the mud as the tide of favor quickly receded.

Amidst these broils, while Cromwell and the army were away, the Senate---led by the whole Realm's complaints and even frightened by the commotions which, though presently suppressed indeed, at some future time might erupt (like fiery blasts held in underground caverns) into a huge earthquake--turned its mind to saner counsels. And now weariness of Cromwell had possessed the Senators, and they were ashamed to vote at the soldiers' nod. Those recently expelled from the Senate were recalled, and the number of those wishing for the King and Peace prevailed. At once the Edict for consulting the King no further was rescinded, and conversations with him begun. But this on the Isle of Wight. Why not in mid-England, if they wanted a free King and contented People? What to do? The King was not in the Senate's power, but that of the Army. Among the soldiers hardly anyone was faithful to the Senate--almost to a man they adored Cromwell's star. It was no less ridiculous than pitiful to see the Senators debating matters controlled by another, King and Kingdom, of course; rather as if they had voted on an Ottoman Prince held by the Janissaries.

The King's prison, however, was unbelted, and he permitted to enjoy the open air, but with a stipulation prohibiting him to leave the Isle for forty days after the Conference's end. Lest he do this, he was nobly provided with an inflexible guard of soldiers.

I am not minded to trace every act of that Conference, for I am not composing a History; I will recount a few things contributing to this Best King's renown and his enemies' perpetual infamy. So few Presbyterians returned, the Independents' party was more powerful, not in number, to be sure, but purpose. And the very ones who were inflamed with great hate of this party, were too unfriendly to the King and quite alienated from the Royalist party, the favorers of which had already been moved from the Senate six years before and replaced by others. From these men, therefore, not even hatred of the Independents or love of personal safety could wrest conditions fair to the King. Yet, beyond the hope of all, the King approved very many most unfair conditions, with this reservation, however, that "Nothing in that Conference be held ratified without final agreement as to all conditions."

For this Conference the Senate had chosen for itself six from Lords, ten from Commons, and some especially noted Theologians; for the King, only a few whose advice he should use, and these admitted with much wariness on the part of the Senate. None of these, however, was permitted to assist the King when in Conference. The King alone, against all whom the victorious faction accounted its most skillful and learned, filled the parts of both Politician and Theologian, even more copiously than all his adversaries. His enemies were stupefied at the King's prudence, learning, persuasiveness, keenness in discussing things with tireless patience, intellectual strength, and incredible self-possession. But they marvelled the most at his Heroic generosity, so controlled by pious gentleness that though he would allow his own rights and revenues to be diminished, yet not for threats or the most pressing danger of death would he suffer anything to be extorted whence less to Religion or to the dignity of his Posterity might come. And in that Conference he held two things more venerable than his Realm or Life--Honor and Conscience.

The Love for his People of this Best King, who wished to repair public losses at personal expense after so many calamities, had made the Senate's delegates from enemies into friends; and they poured forth secret groans and poorly hid tears forced by pity, as they thought on what a King they had crushed and were going to lose, how miserably they were wasting labor in treating about Realm, Religion, and Treaties with a King set in the power of monstrous brutes, and destined for assassins' swords.

The Senate had demanded, "that all the King's Edicts against the Senate should be rescinded; that the Episcopal Order and the Anglican Liturgy should be abolished; that the King should give up the power of Militia and choosing of Magistrates for twenty years; that administration of Ireland should be in the Senate's power; that it should have charge of paying public debts; that dignities conferred by the King since the war started should be without effect; that a new Seal should be struck; that London's Privileges should be confirmed; that the Court of Wards be abolished, to be compensated by annual payment of £50,000 English."

For such hard conditions--which the very Soldiers, even while they were softening the King, had scorned as being unfair--the King showed himself most ready. He conceded all, these only excepted: "He wished the Episcopal Order to remain; he permitted Senate payment of public debts, provided they render biennial accounts; as for abolition of the Court of Wards, he demanded £100,000 yearly."

By these concessions the Senate now seemed to have obtained its wish; whence there were dismay and alarm for not a few Senators. For whither should they turn if occasion for complaint should be cut off? Therefore a great quarrel was stirred up for the King about the Episcopal order, to which they well knew the King would cling by the teeth. Here indeed that sacred Hero's innate piety and unshaken firmness in Religion shone forth the most: for he who had restrained himself many years in affairs of war and peace and had given up his greatest revenues, now seemed (unmoved in point of religion) so greatly mindful of God, to have forgotten himself and his children. That, however, you shall marvel in this firmness at his equal courtesy and wisdom--he suffered the abolition in Episcopacy of "whatever was not entirely of Divine Right," namely "Episcopal Jurisdiction and the Archbishopal Grade." But to concede that Presbyters and Deacons could be created without a Bishop, he never could be brought, just as it was impossible in the Anglican Church before to confer Holy Orders on Bishops without Presbyters. But since the quarrel was whether this Power belonged especially to a Bishop of Presbyters (which would not take a day to judge), and the peacemakers urged the very-present sword of necessity, the King conceded that the Bishops not exercise this power for three years without the Presbyters' consent, while Theologians chosen on both sides for this business decide something certain about Ecclesiastical Discipline. Accordingly they should try Presbyterian Discipline during the next triennium.

Soon they sharply tormented the King's benevolent mind about the Lands and Revenues of the Bishops, especially with this argument, that "a good part of them had been sold in parcels by the Senate, the money disbursed for public uses, and it would be hard to regain the lands from their new possessors." Smitten from both sides with horror at the Sacrilege, the pious King could not be compelled by any arguments or necessity to suffer the Church Lands to be sold. This, however, he yielded to necessity, that "the Lands be farmed out for ninety years, with a small rental reserved annually as a testimony of Hereditary Right and Bishops' Alimony; when that time should be over, they would revert to the Crown's right, to be spent for the Use of the Church." Those who knew the most religious King's intent swear he had decided to redeem those Lands with his personal wealth, and restore them to the Church.

Besides the foregoing demands, the Senate pressed for the King to punish most severely all who had helped him in the war. In a long, malicious list they had noted who should lose their heads, be stripped of all their fortunes, fined a part of their goods, or deprived of every office in the Commonweal and benefice in the Church. How hateful this was to the Best King, I leave any man to judge. Since, however, he could not oppose alone such a torrent of iniquity, he permitted many moderate penalties to be imposed on some--that some should be prohibited from court, some exiled from the Kingdom, others for three years lost the right of sitting in Assemblies; that none be tried for treason, or executed, or stripped of fortunes; and that the Senate could bring any Royalist to trial, if he had done anything against the Laws passed before this war.

In this last condition the King most took counsel for his own:

for by the Laws no one could be prosecuted for bearing arms for his King. And once restored to his solid dignity, the King could have mitigated the other penalties.

The matter already looked to an agreement, and there was discussion of recalling the King--either to London or one of the Royal houses--and passing a law of amnesty. The Senate had now indeed assented that the King should get all revenues and emoluments of the Crown, and that just compensation be repaid for the Royal rights which the King had permitted to be nullified.

But here the Soldiery, at the name of peace, raged, menaced, and complained: nothing had been accomplished by so many labors borne, so many enemies defeated, so many difficulties overcome by their virtue, should the King recover the dignity he had lost with arms, by a willing surrender of the Senate and Army; the Soldiery would perish unless the King did. The victorious army therefore flew to the gates of London, and whereas before they had requested an end of the Conference and punishment of all defendants, now they bluntly demanded the King's head for punishment, payment of their wages from the Royal wealth, and sale of the Church's lands for the same end. These they asked, now in the people's, now in the army's name--oh, the impudence! since not even a thousandth part of the people had assented.

The Senate, after setting aside the Soldiers' petition, persisted in seriously treating with the King just the same. But the Soldiers were vexed and thought it superfluous to seek from others what was in their hand. Consequently men were sent to the Isle of Wight to take the King in the middle of the conference and remove him to Hurst Castle--a sordid, cramped, unhealthy place, set in the very sea, and high inaccessible. The Army pitched its camp between the cities of London and Westminster; every place near the Senate was occupied by the soldiery. And they doubted not that, with the King captive and the Army occupying the very entrance to the Senate, all the Senators who wanted the King and Peace would fall away, and the rest vote at the Soldiers' dictate.

But this hope deceived them; for the Senate both assembled in greater number and expressed itself more freely on an ultimate concord with the King, though arms rattled on all sides; for the Independents would vainly "confine" the Senators until all their own forces had arrived. But finally, having bid farewell to those quibbles which--out of the fretful pedantry of the kind itself and the ungoverned obstinacy of that faction--had been able to hold them so long, they got down to a decision that "The Royal Concessions afford a suitable basis for peace." There were two hundred votes for the decision, scarcely sixty for the other side.

And the Senate had indeed been able to deliver this verdict and maintain it once delivered, so long as the army was far off, engaged with the Scotch or Royalists, and there were faithful, firm troops at hand for the Londoners. They had been able, I say, had their judgment not been foolish and their hatred of Royalists more important than their own welfare. But "Phrygians are wise late"--unless, perchance, you'll deny they're wise, because late!

The Upper Chamber agreed with the Lower. Men were sent to express the decision to the General and Leaders of the Army. But the Army expressed its own opinion to the Senate at its next sitting, and, of course, like a dragoon. For they barred around two hundred Senators on the way in; even locked up forty of them in jail; and certain ones they hardly approved of, who by then had secretly sneaked in, they forcibly extracted and thrust out. O Divine wisdom! O justice marvelous, fearsome, adorable! Behold these lights of the Senate, these glories of the Militia, these national leaders who with might and counsel had reduced their King to extremities, now treated disgracefully by their own soldiers, and from the Senate they had defended with so many crimes, cast into chains and weakened by the stench of long imprisonment. These were wages worthy of so many turbulent crimes, paid out by those whom they were hiring for rebellion, and whom they had led by force and guile into deceit and the crime of damnable high treason.

Now the Senate, which should consist of five hundred Senators, had been reduced to forty--worthless men, and (so to speak) the drags sticking in the jug with the Senate emptied out. For who born in honorable station, who with any virtue or nobility leaping in his fibers, would have wished to sit in a Senate which was going to vote on the King's head? The Noble and the Honorable fear to violate the King, as being the Fount of Nobility and Dignity. You must scrape up cobblers, butchers, tuppence rascals--and pick the worst of the lot, too--if you want to name the King's Judges.

Of such scum were those few remaining Senators, and of them the great part military Tribunes; and their Leaders the basest of men who, simultaneously members of Senate and Army, would report the Soldiers' orders to the Senate. For the Name of Authority was in the Senate, but the Authority itself in the Army.

And so in the new Senate new laws, a new form of Empire is hammered out; the most ancient foundations of English government are quite uprooted. From this sacred tripod it is pronounced that the People hold the whole power of Empire, Assemblies hold the People's power, the House of Commons that of Assemblies and the House of Lords besides; that to start a war against this House of Commons is high treason; and that the King, because of the arms he assumed against such Majesty, should be tried for treason and undergo the death penalty.

No sooner said than done. They set up a Court and call it Supreme, wherein to decide the King's fate. To it, they name six Lords only, some regular Judges of the Courts, and some from Commons quite deaf to the King. Some are added from London's dregs and the Anabaptist neighborhood. Of these, one or so is a cobbler, the others brewers, goldsmiths, and joiners. Why mention Bankrupts who had quit the mart, Extortioners, Embesslers, Gluttons, Loafers, and the best-known Whoremasters, those foulest slaves of strolling lust? Of these new-made Judges, a good many from the army had been chosen already sworn against the King's life.

Yet a more packed House of Lords convened; it condemned the election to pick the King's judges, and perceived its own welfare at stake and all the branches of honor cut off in the King, as from the root and trunk of dignity. Lo, penitence at last--alas, how late! For they had brought things to the point whence not even they hoped to retrieve it by their votes. However, they did what they could--they branded perpetual infamy on so horrible a decree.

Strongly aroused, the conspirators at present, however, decided on nothing harsher than expunging all Lords from the number of Judges chosen against the King. Those most like Justices of the Courts were erased, that is, those who, when consulted about the point, had replied that "It was against the Laws of England for the King to stand judgment."

Behold, then, a Court of judges without judges, without Law, and without the appearance of them. This sordid and scoundrally Court is headed by a President its equal, a most obscure and saucy rogue; an orator his peer is chosen to accuse the King. Whence, as I recall the deed and its doers, it seems less marvelous for such a horrible deed, hateful to God and man, to be accomplished, than for the men found to undertake it to go ahead. Of course, a very many, now from the Senate and now from the number of Judges, got away and hid while this monstrous Tragedy was acted out.

Meanwhile, nearly all the pulpits of London thundered against this ruinous madness; and all the pastors with practically one voice prayed, asked, and implored with orations, letters, conferences, and pleading tracts, that if they respected the Commonwealth, Religion, their plighted Word, and finally God (the Protector and Avenger of Kings), they shed not the King's sacred blood, which would weigh grievously on their own heads and the whole Realm. The many, many promises and holy professions sent out publicly by the Senate are urged, that the King's safety would be its care, and its sincerity towards him absolutely honorable. Laws of the Kingdom, the Authority of Scripture, the Law of Nations, Notions of Right and Good innate in all mortals, the disgrace everywhere to the Reformed Church, its danger, even, abroad--all are adduced. Why say more? All things were employed which could have moved hearts of iron. But not these,

For whose misdeed ev'n nature found no name,
Nor with hard metal could express its blame.

Hugh Peters, a demagogue unequalled in the whole kingdom, continually inflamed the Senate and Army from his pulpit for the King's execution. But who is this man? One who long ago abandoned the Ministry, of all scoundrels the boldest liar, the most depraved buffoon, the foulest adulterer, one who even now drives a noble man among us to exile while he abuses the man's wife at his pleasure.

But even as the King is pleaded for in England, the Scots manage with greater confidence. They demand that the King, as more their own, be saved and returned; and all but order it. They add the treaties entered and solemnly sworn at the start of the war, whereby fine guarantee was given for Safety of the King and his Posterity, and for keeping in good repair the rights of sovereignty in either nation. They recall more recent promises of the Senate, when the Scotch handed over the King to the English, that "the King was going to be held in the greatest honor, and enjoy a real security"; and finally the Senate's newest profession of all, hardly four months before, when Delegates from the Scotch Senate, treating with the English Senate about the King and his Rights, bore hence this reply: "They did not wish to change the form of the English Kingdom, wherein the King reigned, and shared his counsel with a Senate consisting of two Chambers, one of Lords and the other of Commons." What said the Senate now? "Then it had not wished to convert the Kingdom to a Popular Government, but did now; it had absolute freedom both ways, willy-nilly, as the Commonwealth's safety demanded."

This trick of these foulest gallows-birds, of course, subverts all compacts, all faith in commerce among men, and the moral sense itself. For one's word is not given or required about present, but future things. If any King negotiated through his Envoys with a neighboring King about securing peace and restoring destroyed property, he would accomplish nothing if agreements could be cheated by this shift: "Then it pleased me, now it doesn't, and past agreements put no necessity on my will for the future." Thus, there would be no agreements except as to the past, for whatever we say is past even then. Certainly, with these monstrous beasts that thrust out reason and faith, there remains one way to deal--Force of Arms. The Scots therefore resolved on this, and would that the whole world had, too: for monsters which banish faith from man's affairs should be attacked with the collective strength of all.

The most powerful Orders of the Federated Belgians, who labored mightily with entreaty and ransom offered through their Orators to redeem the King's sacred head, had been able to do no more. English Nobles even pledged their life for the King's, ready to suffer punishment if the King had sinned at all. The people, however, rage on all sides, nor merely mutter at the injury; but openly protest, force upon, grow angered at, even menace (alas, how vainly!) the soldiers stationed everywhere. And yet the clamor of the People was not checked by the fierce looks, words, and blows, too, of the armed men: let them return their King--the People had not undergone so many burdens, paid so many taxes, to the end that this most beloved King should be killed before the People's eyes. If they fought for the People, they should not, against popular wish, remove the King and Kingly Power from their midst: all wished for, all sighed for the King.

But the only thing achieved by the People's roar was for the unspeakable parricide to be hurried on. And so, surrounded by an armed guard, King Charles, that Sacred and August Head, is produced before this novel court, unheard-of by any century. He is accused in the name of the English People of high treason, Tyranny, Murders and Rapines, but principally of a war begun against Parliament--woe, polluted men!--which, indeed, by their own confessions they had started. Yet this same People, in whose name he was accused, gazed on wailing, and by its tears cast the lie on his accusers; even as the King--his face displaying his innate Majesty and by the serenity of his countenance showing a composed mind--seemed to address the grieving People with his eyes: "Grieve not over me, but grieve over yourselves, and over your children."

The accusation once read, the King asked the new-made Judges: "By what authority did they judge their legitimate King, and this against a public promise, just given by either Order? By what authority?" he asked. "For it was not unknown to him that a good many powers prevailed everywhere relying on no laws, as those of pirates and footpads. Let them only show by what right they arrogated themselves this power--he was prepared to reply; but if they could not, let them avert this crime from their heads and the people's. Certainly, he was determined not to betray the province entrusted to him by God, and descended to him by a most ancient lineage."

To the President, who growled that he was called to Justice by authority of the English People by whom he had been elected King, the King replied: "In no wise by election, but by a succession of over a thousand years had the Kingship devolved upon him; he asserted the rights of the English People more fully and better by refusing an authority illegitimate and set up at pleasure, than they by adding to it. But if they would show the authority of Parliament, nobody was here to be seen" (he looked over the remaining assembly) "of the order of Nobles, without whom Parliament could not be constituted. A King also ought to be there to judge a King. But truly, neither one nor the other House of Parliament, nor any tribunal in the world, had any right to degrade a King of England, much less some counterfeit judges, pretending for themselves the authority of the Lower Chamber which they themselves had trampled. Let them produce their Authority then--it would be the same as a crime for him to yield to a Tyrannic, and resist a Legitimate Power." The President frequently contradicted the King as he spoke, and ordered him taken like a prisoner into custody.

The King, fetched a second and a third time by the Parricides and ordered to reply to the charges, otherwise soon to hear the death sentence, ordered "them in turn to justify the power usurped against their King: he accounted his Life worth little compared to his Reputation, his conscience, the Laws, and the People's Liberty, all which would be shaken by their defense before such Judges. For what power have Subjects to name Judges for their King, power sanctioned by what Laws? Not, certainly, by Divine ones, which teach that obedience is to be shown to Princes; not by human and national laws, for English Laws order that all actions of the Law be done in the King's name: but to the Lower Chamber they allow not even the least power to punish the lowest subject, to say nothing of the King. If the People should have this power fully, and they truly have it from the People, surely they would have first consulted the People on such a matter; but not each tenth man had been consulted"; he could have said, each thousandth.

The President, utterly insolent, interrupted the King, and ordered him to be mindful of his place; he quite forgetful of his own. The Chamber well knew its Right, and did not wish to hear reasons calling its Authority into doubt. "But what, or where," inquired the King, "is that Court wherein there is no place for reason?" The King persisted in calling this novel Authority to the test of Law and Reason, until that distinguished President ordered the prisoner removed. But the King said, "Remember it is your King, from whom you turn your ears." Then, turned to the People: "See what Justice Subjects must expect from these men who will not hear their King."

Summoned now a fourth time, the most August King is brought before this tribunal of wretches; there "the Judge, admired in Tyrian red," very bitterly scolds the King's contumacy, orders the King to submit to the Court, to reply to the charges; if he obeys not, to hear at once the sentence of death. The King recognised the Court's authority as he should, and steadfastly refused to plead his case before them; he asked leave to impart to the Senators of either order some things concerning the People's welfare and the peace of the Kingdom. The President of those murderers refused; for thus delays would be continued, and justice delayed. The King retorted that "a delay of one or two short days should better be undergone than a sentence hurried up, whence a perpetual tragedy of woes would rise for the whole Realm and children yet unborn; he could, if he should seek occasions for delay, plead his case and protract it at length, and at least delay the foul sentence. But he preferred dying as the Defender of Laws and Right, and the Martyr of his People, to prolonging his life by prostituting these; but he entreated liberty to speak very briefly before the dark and foul sentence was pronounced, which it would harder to retract once delivered, than even to prevent."

But claiming that brief liberty of speech for himself, the Parricides' President started a long harangue which I leave to their own Historians to recount; a speech how fierce, lying, and shameless, this criterion alone will indicate: this King, the mildest and kindest of all who have ruled England, he compares to Caligula, saying that he had wished the whole English People had one neck he could shorten at a blow.

At last the sentence was read: "Since Charles Stuart, accused by the People of Tyranny, Treason, and Misrule, said nothing for himself, he is held guilty of the crimes charged, and contumacy besides; he is condemned to die, and his head to be severed from his body."

After the sentence had been pronounced, the remaining Judges, ready to approve it, stand at invitation of the President, they being in number sixty-seven though the Senate had picked 150; but horror at the crime drove many away, among them Fairfax the General. With a look expressing not anger, but pity, the King called them "unhappy souls who would dare the same against their Leaders, if hired for a paltry sum." The Anabaptist Soldiers spat on his clothes as he passed; one even spattered his august face with spit, which he, the more joyful for his conformity with Christ, meekly wiped off saying, "Christ suffered much for my sake." It will not be ours to praise the King's patience, sacred indeed, through those who applauded the Soldier's wicked impudence; for the moment it was done, a military Tribune who had sat as a Judge against the King, told the thing to his likes, with great commendation of the noble Soldier.

And so, that Charles might suffer many things like Christ, the Soldiers redouble their mockeries of him. They blow Tobacco fumes, which they know annoy him, in his face, and throw fragments of tablets before his feet as he walks; they call him a Tyrant, rail at him, club to death those daring to salute him as he goes by, and slay at his feet one man even as he prays God to pity him.

Let those good Judges say, who punish killing even in a King; what inquiry was held into this murder committed by a common soldier? Particularly since the King was innocent, the soldier was plainly criminal. If they were to say it was not safe for the Judges to punish the Soldier while the army, in arms and aroused, surrounded them, let them admit that the same force prevailed in the King's condemnation; and the whole thing was done not by law but arms. But if it were a great crime, payable by death, to pray for the King they condemned and openly wished sent to Hell, and if, like another Phineas, that Soldier-assassin performed a prompt and laudable work: alas! how many thousands of men, bound for the same crime, have they condemned to death! For though the whole People should pray for the welfare of its King destined for the ax, if the People had one neck, these would have lopped it off in that man. But if, in the confusion of things, an inquiry into that killing could not be held while the Soldiers' minds were provoked, why, in the profound quiet that followed after they were reduced to order, did no vengeance of justice follow so public and cruel a crime? We, however, are perhaps ridiculous, who from parricides against so sacred and public a head demand vengeance for a private murder, nor suffer a homicide to hide under the parricide.

And so I return to the King. Doomed to die, in St. James's Palace (formerly his Court and now his prison) he completely applies himself to the duties of piety, having with difficulty obtained the ministry of Juxon, Bishop of London; who formerly had conducted his private worship, a most pious and prudent man, less hated by the Senate and People of London than the other Royal Theologians because he had discharged the office of High Inquisitor of England with kindness and integrity; even too often obliging to the Londoners. Him, therefore, the King selected as the helper of his last fortitude and piety; with him to spend the time in nightly Discourse and Fasting, to fortify himself with the viaticum of the Eucharist, to strengthen his mind by sacred reading and religious conversation, he who would shortly grapple with death.

Yet he was not allowed to enjoy that real freedom of Religion usually not denied those condemned to death; at his last, thus far did the wicked insolence of the profane Soldiers rage: night and day they break into the Royal chamber, mock the praying King with jarring laughter, pursue him with jeering sarcasm, disturb him with quibbles; though he, with marvelous self-control and a contempt that helped his patience, dissimulated their taunts and fleers; and by his Royal gravity and right reason so deflated the ill-timed babble of the Anabaptists, that very many, stupefied and defeated by their captive, retreated.

It has been reported by men quite worthy of credit, that it was discussed in the Military Council what tortures and disgraces should be added to capital punishment, for they thought it too little for the King simply to die; and that the clemency of the godly perrioides finally prevailed, that he should be decapitated on a scaffold erected for the woeful scene inside an area they call White-Hall, hard by a great dining-room set aside for state dinners and receiving Ambassadors, much the finest in the whole Realm; that where his Majesty had shone the most, he should be supremely disgraced. And because they had heard the King would not submit his neck to the ax of his subjects, the scaffold was fitted with iron hooks wherewith the head and shoulders of the struggling King would be held.

Though these stem from the greatest hate for the King, yet that it may be plain that they burned with a greater hatred for Royal dignity and that Charles was hated less than "King," we must not omit that the day before he departed this life, the Soldiers came to him with certain conditions whereby, if he would sign, he would preserve both his Life and the name of King. The King rejected them on first or second reading, saying that "He would have to go to a thousand deaths before his Honor and the People's Liberty would be prostituted thus."

At last, on the fatal day (less, indeed, for him than for the whole Realm), the holy King was conducted from St. James's Palace to White-Hall; and making the half-mile journey afoot through the intervening enclosure, with his brisk look and quick stride he seemed to fly rather than go to his death, repeatedly chiding his armed guards for tardiness, and reminding them that he was now preceding them, though about to struggle for a heavenly crown--less troubled now than formerly when he led his soldiers, ready to join battle for an earthly diadem.

Conducted to a bedchamber, he passed the space of an hour in prayer. Thence he was brought out on a scaffold draped with a black cloth; the ax was in sight, two Masked Executioners, and, lower than the planking, some cavalymen ready to use force if the King should cause too much trouble. These were enclosed, and dense squadrons of horsemen kept the People far off, lest the King be heard. Therefore, if he had planned any oration to the People, he suddenly changed plan, compelled to make his speech to his enemies and the Parricide's Ministers alone, whom he thus addressed:

"I would have preferred to make no speech before you, except I feared that my silence would be drawn by some into an argument for my guilt, and my suffering of punishment into an awareness of the crimes charged.

"As a witness of my innocence, I call on God, at whose tribunal I soon must stand, that it never entered my mind to diminish the just Privileges of Parliament, nor did I conscript an army before they had prepared forces hostile to me; this indeed will be established by examining the order of history, and the Calendar of Diplomatic and State Papers.

"Meanwhile I acknowledge, and, with the greatest submission of mind, venerate Divine Justice, which through an unjust sentence inflicts a just punishment on me, because I did not free an innocent man when he was oppressed by a most unfair sentence."

He was referring to the Earl of Strafford, Lord Deputy of Ireland who, accused of high treason seven years before because of a great conspiracy of the English Parliament, Scotch Army, and Irish Lords, had been condemned though the King resisted most stubbornly; nor could the King be brought by the collective prayers and might of three Kingdoms to assent to his condemnation, until Theologians of great repute persuaded his mind, weary of Rule, that "the People's voice was God's, and that three nations would equally flare into a dire war, unless one man, to become a victim of public hate, should be surrendered to their demands; that it was better for one to perish, than all." Unequal to such violence of all against one man, the King at last gave a sign and ordered it to be done then as they wished. However, if therefore you divide among its authors the guilt of his blood, no share will belong to the King, and the Senate which condemned the King took the entire blame on itself. Yet this consent, though extorted from him by every force and ruse, oppressed the King's soul at the last, and he acknowledged God's Justice for a sin, indeed more of others, and yet his however, in this unjust judgment of assassins. Let this serve as a warning to all, that "there is no just excuse for sin: persuaders to crime indeed do draw another's sin to themselves, but do not withdraw it from those whom they have driven into the evil part: that it is most unsafe through sin to resist harm; finally, that even those things which, though well augured, we do wrongly, stain us with sin and infix a thorn that will remain in the wound."

I say, however, that both this confession of the King in the last act of his life, and the whole affair from the start as men are now, redound absolutely to the King's praise. For if that condemnation--which, though done by every Order of the Realm, his authority so long prohibited, but at last permitted when he had been grimly "requested" by the Scots army and deafened by the clamors of England,

Scotland, and Ireland—yet galled his soul even to his last plight, so as that, even when holding his neck under the ax, though wrongly condemned he paid due honors to the deed by this recognition: what a King will you think he was—how upright, how holy? For just as a field is level, wherein there slightly projects a molehill, hardly to be seen in unequal soil; thus is that soul pure, whose blemishes seem as tumors, and that forgets not its least faults, which in others would lie hid among greater ones. For how few princes cast not their faults upon their Ministers? But this one does not even cover his permission under the will of Assemblies and the voices of three Kingdoms, remembering that he ought to have protected justice against them. But what mortal could have resisted that torrent? whom would that headlong tide not have carried off? If through his lust or wrath (for which, license of rulers loves to let slip the reins) he had plundered his people or shed innocent blood, his conscience would not now—dragged, on this threshold of grim Death, in the too-harsh chains of guilty memory to the supreme Judge's throne—have dwelt on his permission to condemn one man, and that extorted by force.

But let us hear the holy Martyr speak: "With what charity," he said, "I embrace enemies raging against me, let that good man be my witness" (He was pointing to the Bishop of London). "I freely pardon them all from my inmost heart, and I strenuously beg the God of compassion that he deign to grant them a repentance at last, and forgive this crime.

"I cannot, however, so long as I even draw breath, not be concerned about the peace of my Kingdom; since it has, as my fortunes are now, no fitter counsel, I will clearly show the way wherefrom it has wandered far, and by which you, Soldiers, must return it to virtue and peace.

"Herein I see you erring most grievously, in that you think to take the Sovereignty upon you by power of the sword and no shadow of the Law, not even the slightest; you strive to stabilise the Kingdom not by the authority of Laws, but of Victory. Yet you must hope for no law from victory, unless a just cause for war have preceded, whether for repulsing injuries, or recovering rights wickedly withheld. But indeed, if Victors stretch their Victory beyond the just and good and measure their Right by their success, what cause were there to prevent Kingdoms which are set up from being, and being called, Piracies? Which we read a Pirate once retorted to Alexander.

"But no other way can the erring return to the right path of Peace, by no other counsel, believe me, can they avert divine wrath, than by rendering to God, King, and People, each its own. You have returned to God what are his, if you have restored his pure worship, and, according to the rule of God's Word, the right order of the Church, now long overthrown and violated; this a National Synod, duly called and free to determine, would most conveniently do. The rights of the King my successor will stand, if you have revived entirely what the Laws enjoin and declare. Finally, you will affirm to the People their Rights and true Liberty, indeed not by exalting them into the Society of Kingship, but by tempering the Prince's authority and People's obedience with the laws. Because I could no way be brought to assent that these be curtailed by the rule of a great sword, lo, here I am brought, to be the Martyr of my people."

The King had stopped a moment, when drawing near, the Bishop of London advised him to declare his thoughts on Religion, which though none called into doubt because well proved by the whole tenor of his life, would yet be useful to satisfy the People and custom on that score.

"For my part" (said the King, facing the People) "I have left a testimony of my faith with this good man" (namely the Bishop). "Nay, I expect testimony on this point from all by whom my Life and Profession were seen. As for the rest, I die in the Christian faith according to the same profession of the Christian Church, which my Father of most happy memory bequeathed me."

Then surveying the Tribunes, he thus spoke: "Relying on most merciful God, and most sure of the Justice of my cause, I both trust and desire that I am directly going to exchange this corruptible Crown for another one incorruptible, and that I shall cross over into another Kingdom quite free from all strife and tumult."

Then, leaning forward on his knees, having prayed briefly, he offered his sacred neck to the fearsome ax; and in a moment, the foul blow equally decapitated three Kingdoms in that August head.

They say that the King, a few hours before, had doubted whether to submit his neck to his subjects' ax. It seemed more Regal, with a sword plucked from someone or by seizing the ax itself, to kill one or two of the assassins with his own hands, and to die in a most just defense. But the Bishop of London, the mildest of men, persuaded him to close this last Act with that gentleness and gravity he had acted it so far. It was no unworthier for a King to offer his throat to the knives of Subjects, than for Christ, the King of Kings, to carry the cross imposed by His Subjects; nor should he lose in death that likeness to Christ which he had already gained in his condemnation; not to fall, by struggling with base souls, from that serenity of soul prepared by fastings and prayers, and necessary to one preparing himself for eternal rest. It was most noble to forgive his enemies: Blessed are they who suffer. Nor, indeed, did the King's mind ponder long in this doubt, better prepared for Christian patience.

The King now dead, these barbarous killers sport with his lifeless body; they dip their hands in his hot gore--destined to be on their heads--and not content with their hands, they dabble their very staffs in the Royal blood for a jest. That you might know, however, they valued the King highly, they even sell his hairs, the blood-stained sand, bloody fragments of the block on which the Royal neck had lain for execution. The corpse is handed over for disembowelling to some Quack and camp surgeons utterly bitter toward the Royal name, with commands to seek carefully whether he was infected with Venereal disease or any other vice; these tools well understanding the intent of their likes, their masters--namely, they were told and ordered to lie. But a more honorable Physician opposed the calumny; called upon, he forced himself upon the dissection of the Royal corpse, and confirmed that all was sound and healthy in that August body, promising the strongest health and a very long life, had not premature death cut them short.

When the King had been removed, the Bishop of London was put under guard, and the papers the King had handed him taken away. The King's clothes were torn up and his chests rifled so that no Royal writings would get abroad; no doubt but that they deprived the world of many fair examples of piety and prudence.

However, by the greatest kindness and providence of the Most High, there survived that heartless search a marvelous work, the Eikon Basilike, or volume of Royal soliloquies, wherein he had spent the long time of imprisonment. Than this book, nothing more worthy of a Christian King has appeared since Apostolic writings. All generations will marvel at such serenity of mind in such calamities, at such patience, wisdom, and fortitude; at such eloquence in such simplicity, not painted with borrowed colors, but strong with the sharpest feeling of its very subjects, and of piety and prudence; lustrous with perpetual light. You may justly doubt which of these, indeed, stands out more in this Royal Work. For what holier than this piety, what more fervent or effective on the emotions? What wiser than this prudence of a King most skilled in divine and human law, and most practised by the long struggle of so many adversaries? Yea, all good men feel the benefit arising from so sacred a volume. The envy kindled thence by its enemies truly burns them to the quick, and will not quit burning until, with a fire lit on all sides by compatriots and foreigners, it at last consumes them to ashes.

But thrust into jail, the Bishop of London was held for no plain cause. The King had been heard on that fatal scaffold repeating "Remember! Remember!" to the Bishop. Therefore they must extort from this great man what it was that the King, next to death, with such care ordered him to remember. The Bishop, brought before the Judges and bidden, with the most grievous threats, to tell it, was a long time silent. Ordered, finally, to speak the whole and simple truth, he said, "My Lord the King had ordered me, that if I could get to the Prince his son and heir, to bear him this last command of his dying father: that when restored to his Sovereignty and Power, he should forgive you, the authors of his murder: this, truly, the King ordered me again and again to remember." O King to be venerated even by his killers! O holy parent of his People! O true disciple of Christ, who would pray for his enemies even after his death!

The sudden light of undeserved compassion daunted the parricides, and admonished them for their crime. On the face of each were shame and glum silence, as if too late they venerated whom they had just slain, and as if the very mention of the pity they had denied their king threw fear into those assassins. So ingrained, even for those who have abandoned equity and good sense, is a feeling of Justice, that those who have flown unchecked to injustice, at the name of pity greatly fear Justice. And so, having learned little, the Judges remand the Bishop to jail, whence his integrity and affability of manner afterwards brought this very Great Man unharmed.

Meanwhile, through all England, and the three Kingdoms equally, there were tears, wails, hate of public business, neglect of private concerns, every word and deed those of angered or despondent men, and all but final despair. For what spirit would you think survived for judicious men, when the pious Father of his Country had been slain before the people's eyes, the Monarchy exterminated, Religion besmirched, the Church suffocated? Into what hope would they raise their children, to be utterly miserable slaves of the foulest tyranny, sighing under an Anabaptist yoke upon their consciences? Or what is worse, instead of Religion, to imbibe fanatic insanity? Why should they husband or increase a fortune to be plundered at the whim of soldierly insolence and employed against the legitimate heir of the Kingdoms, so that they would, in a way, have lost their safety by their own hands and go put out the one star of ruined sovereignty, which through hope might even inspire some sort of life into the great body?

The crime had indeed been huge, though the loss less, if they had slain Caligula or the likes of Peter of Castile or Demetrius of Russia. But woe, they have killed another Titus, nay, one far better than Titus, the people's Love, the Beloved of the Human Race. The entire series of British Kings shows not such justice, mercy, and piety; all Histories hardly show such in any man. What force of genius he had! what sanctity of manners! what moderation in prosperity! what fortitude in adversity! what reverence for the Most High! what love for his people! what care at the end for Religion and the Church, for which he even finally poured forth his life! His gentleness alone threw a clog into his other virtues, a gentleness which preferred awakening sluggish souls to their duty through his full confidence, to holding them in their duty by force and Power, while he could; whence came ruin to him and his people; when, indeed, he would have better counseled for, if he had indulged them less.

Let Kings learn, that most things are denied the People with greater clemency than granted to them; that the Father of his Country ought rather to estimate what profits the people, than what they demand. That Prince best looks out for public welfare who preserves his own, and commits himself to no power but his own, nor suffers another to do anything without him in his Realm: For an unaccustomed authority beyond their own sphere, crazes and sets Subjects' minds beside themselves; for indeed those who do more than is right, do still more than they ought, and by the very ease of their considered crimes, they are not admonished beforehand.

The Father killed, the next task is his Son and heir. They had already declared him guilty of high treason; now, by public edict they make all traitors, who shall call him King, or pray for his welfare under the name of Charles II, or Prince, or King of Scotland, or the Royal first-born. They made it doubtful whether one could pray for him as a man! It was likewise decreed that no prayers be offered for the Duke of York or any Royal offspring, and the King's lineage by Edict is deprived of their Royal right and all their fortunes.

By another Edict, Monarchy is abolished, the House of Lords terminated, and the most ancient Kingdom of England changed into a Popular state. And that you shall be more indignant, all these are done by a paltry assembly of forty common rogues.

The Mayor of London is ordered to promulgate the Edict; but when he refuses and pleads his original oaths of obedience to the Royal lineage, he is deprived of his Magistracy, confined to the Tower of London, and fined £2000 English. Nor did this severity omit lesser officials and the city Senators who were horrified at this novelty: all were cast out, ejected, and fined; and those who had procured a Conference with the King for their own petitions were sought out also.

But lest it be said these assassins thirsted for Royal blood only, three Lords are added to the King, so that you should know that the Nobility and the King perished together. And to this relapsed that solemn profession of Parliament scarce six months before, that "they did not wish to change the form of the Kingdom." To this came those splendid promises made to the Lords by the army, that "it would protect the House of Lords and its Privileges."

Why should I detail now all the injuries against Charles II? whom they keep from his Kingdoms of England and Ireland; whom they persecute by sea and land; for whom they lay Scotland waste with a hostile army; for whom, as a traitor, they even prepare the ax, lest he miss his paternal inheritance in full measure. He who would examine their separate acts by the rule of justice would waste his time, where indeed "good and evil are interchanged." The crime grows daily, and knows no measure, and crimes heaped on crimes smite the heavens; and, spilled by sacrilegious hands, the sacred blood does continually cry to heaven, "O Jehovah, strong God of vengeance, O strong God of vengeance, appear! Arise, O Judge of the earth, and return retribution to the proud! How long shall the wicked, O Jehovah, how long shall the wicked exult?"

CHAPTER III

The Parricides' Crime against the People

We have now shown the fearfulest crime against the People, the most cruel murder of the King. For since a King rules not over himself but his People, he who violates a King offends the People more than the King. Therefore, it is a piece of the most infamous, crazed impudence to affirm that the King's murder and the Monarchy's abrogation were done for the People. To this end, three things have to be proved. First, of course, that the People have authority against the King; second, that by the People's authority and will the King was punished and the Kingship abolished; and third, certainly, that from this emerges the profit to the People to compensate abundantly for the gravity of the harm and the misery of perpetual war.

But of the People's authority against the King, imaginary in truth, a monster just invented by the English assassins, the Royal Champion has spoken brilliantly, and destroyed the rascally fiction. In the second of these propositions, I might seem to join two quite unrelated things, the People's authority and its will, since the Tyrants by the People's authority do everything against its will. But I am considering not what is done against right and reason, but what right and reason demand. For we are the authors of what we will and do and what others do by our will, not of what is done despite us. But if, however, they do not confuse the name of authority with the power, as the custom has prevailed, what reproach is this to a People's power which it has not, nor asks, even as they encroach on that power of the People so that they obstruct the People's will? Is it to be borne, that whatever dire, criminal, and hateful to God and men the Tyrants do, be imputed to the People, that the disgrace and offense be cast on the People while they themselves enjoy the profits?

What happiness is there from this for the People, wherefore all are invited to embrace the crime of a few? Nay, what a Hydra of evils, what an infinite mass of both crime and misery did the accursed wickedness of these assassins bring on the heads of the whole People?

It is pleasing to hear the People's voices, calling to a reckoning "their own" Delegates even as those abuse the name of Popular power in a horrible way:

"When we chose you to represent us in Assemblies, ye most faithless Delegates, did we commission you to exercise, by an assumed power the People never arrogated itself, judgment against our King and Tyranny against us? Or were you commissioned to defend Religion, the Laws, Liberty, and all our Rights? Which of them have you not violated or destroyed?

"Chiefly, you have miserably defaced Religion by introducing license for Schismatics and every error, removing all forms of prayers and Sacraments, trampling the ordination of Presbyters, sending amongst the people speakers of the foulest beliefs, without learning, without expression, without legitimate mission--soldiers, weavers, cobblers, and the whole mechanic dregs now being admitted to the pulpit. That by these Advocates you defend your cause among the People, not even you can deny; for legitimate Pastors shun this evil task. What sanity have you left us? We have seen horses baptised with impunity; we hear daily that the Lord's Prayer and Apostle's Creed are untaught; in public letters from the army we read that there ought to be no regular calling of Pastors; the principal Temple of the capital city has been converted to a stable, others everywhere destroyed or violated; the Church's yields diverted. And what caps the matter, if we seek the nourishment of God's Word, it is corrupted; if Sacraments, they are denied, so that it now argues a man ill-disposed toward the Commonwealth to continue the practice of the Sacraments.

"Thus you handled Religion; how treat you the King, to whom we had sent you as subjects to plead for subjects? After he, out of his Royal kindness, had conceded us many more things than it was right for us to expect or ask, you persecuted him with a most wrongful war; you took from him the Governance of war and peace; you deprived him of all property, his wife, children, friends, liberty, and the benefit of divine worship; and finally after the long stink of the jail, when he had so long been miserably harassed, and tried before you, you beheaded him with the fearful ax, you utter scoundrels!

"What injury have you done to Royal Majesty, and even our Laws--for, by immortal God, what authority do the Laws give you, or us, against the sacred head of a King? You have undermined the foundation whereon the laws stood, you have cut off the root from which they drew life, whence all laws are completely overthrown, felled, dead. As soon, therefore, as the King was slain and the Monarchy ended, the authority of the Laws lay prostrate, and now there reigns for King and Law only the will of our King's murderers. When the King flourished, we very often opposed his Royal will with the laws, and the King venerated the name of the Law, nor did he impose the ship-money before it had been approved by the Judges and expert lawyers. When by public Edict you were plundering us of the twentieth part of our goods, you replied to us, as we appealed to the Laws and citizens' rights, that 'Your Chamber was the oracle of the Laws; your will must be accounted the Law; there could be an appeal from the King (for Charles I then lived) to Parliament, but no appeal from Parliament.' And this Law---vague, uncertain, checked by no bounds, and just then born---that 'Parliament could do anything without the King,' progressed to such sinful madness that they feared not to take the King himself from our midst, and after removing the laws, by what right or with what injury to take the life and goods of citizens at will.

"The Laws, therefore, being removed with the King, our Liberty and Rights collapsed. For who, in the whole Kingdom, dares to claim anything of his own? His Goods, his ancestral Lands, his Liberty, his Life? All these, by George! your power absolved from Laws can take at a nod, and did, far too often. For by what law were so many citizens clapped into chains, put to torture, for no other crime than refusing to bear arms against their King? By what law are all bound for the crime of high treason who dared feed their King, a starving fugitive? All who fought under him, of course, though relying on their forefathers' laws and doing their duty as Subjects, you punished by death, jail, exile, and confiscation of their entire inheritance. Others dealt with more leniently are compelled to redeem their lands with several years' revenue.

"To this end, through all the Provinces were set up collectors' shops--or rather, butcher shops which disembowel and skin alive nearly all (for how few of them did not adhere to the King?) of the Noble families. To these Rhadamanthuses those defendants for loyalty to the King are recalled two or three times; nor do they quit being defendants before they are beggared. And so, whoever is dragged there,

'Does, crushed by blows, adore, and beaten, pray
That with some teeth he thence may get away.'

"Eminent families lie mutilated and bloodless, while a few wretches, of the lowest dregs, stroll about, sleek from the sap of Nobles and public bloodshed, and the madness of these most monstrous Cyclopes

'Is fed by victims' guts and darkened blood.'

"But these" (you say) "are our enemies, whose sinews, lest they finally rise against us, prudence orders to be cut, and bones broken. It were a marvel, then, if you think not the whole People an enemy, whom you, good 'guardians of Liberty,' miserably flay. For what riches of two Kingdoms, what cruellest exactions against the People, were enough to satisfy your greed? The hope was declared that, from the King's very ample patrimony and the revenues of Bishops and Deans, the People would gain immunity from all tax burdens; this was quite enough for wars, garrisons, and ships, and would remain so. Anything the Bishops and Deans possessed, you possess. Furthermore, you have accumulated immense riches from the sale of private inheritances. Never did Laverna favor any thieves more. Where now is that immunity from public taxes which you were promising us? You fairly provided--which was your benevolence toward us--that no profit should come to us from those ill-gotten gains. To yourselves you took the blame for the rapines, to yourselves the excessive profit, ye most kindly pirates!

"But while you cram your foul maw with so many rapines, alas, we must scrimp and cheat our inclinations, that we may be equal to the immense tributes which, with the greatest cruelty, you exact from us. Doubtless that we might know we have many Kings instead of one, we pay you more taxes than to ten Charleses, had so many reigned at once. Whence came such desperation among the People, whose bones you break and marrow you suck, that unarmed they often rose against armed men, burnt the publicans' lists, and even killed them, though soon to pay heavy penalties for their uncontrolled anger? So cheap is life to men whose means of life have been taken away.

"Nor is it enough that our faculties are taken away--our children are taken also. Sons from their Mothers', Husbands are torn from their Wives' embraces; and these, too, by sheer force, to fight against King and country. Raw, ignorant youths are led into a deceit equally ruinous to their bodies and souls, so that your making us wretched is less than your making us wicked.

"You will allege the most inflexible sword of necessity: that war is being waged at home, in Scotland, in Ireland, the open seas must be protected from pirates, that neither is England defended without soldiery, nor a soldiery kept without pay; that in conscripting a soldiery, danger comes to few but safety to all, that in finances the magnitude of public danger must be estimated, and the common cause should be sustained with common riches.

"But how injuriously do you object to us a necessity which you yourselves have created? 'Fixed by a beam-spike, necessity' compels us, indeed, as subjects to you, most savage Tyrants, to go whither you drag us. You, also, dire necessity compels to defend crimes with crimes; but we utterly deny that a common necessity with you is incumbent on us. Why so? Because after the King had been treated in the worst way, and no hope of pardon was left to the handful of leading traitors, it was, to be sure, necessary to behead the King, to end the Kingdom, and to persecute his legitimate heir by land and sea; was a sharing of both your crimes and dangers 'necessary' for us? It is doubtful whether it is crueller to impose, or to impute, this 'necessity'--of course--to a whole kingdom completely averse to your crime, and obviously most desirous of that heroic youth, its own King. We threaten arms, or pay soldiers' hire against the King? We love, we want the King! But if you fear punishment from the King, there are other Republics to furnish you an Asylum, and a luxurious market for your wealth. Migrate there, free your country from war and yourselves from fear, give back the Kingdom its King and Peace. This were better, and better advised, as you have a crumb of sense left, than with an iron yoke to repress a People raging and muttering threats, than by the murder of countless citizens to protect your tyranny, than to see every man as an enemy, than to walk among the curses and groans of your fellow-countrymen. To this indeed most burdensome hate, any good or prudent man would prefer the cross itself.

"But here you protest: 'O ye men born to slavery, who ascribe liberty to injury! You will finally, you slaves of Kings, suffer yourselves to be freed, though unwilling.'"

"Thus we reply: We are indeed not your likes, we who might think ourselves born to govern. Then were we chiefly free, when proper laws stood for both King and citizens. For our Royal Commonwealth had been so tempered that neither should regal Authority subtract from Liberty, nor Liberty from obedience. You have, of course, come to liberate us, set in that happy balance. Liberators, hah! You might so prevail as with every care and labor you promote our Liberty and not your personal Domination, and had not seized the Principate from the King to transfer it to yourselves: Late did the Democrats realize they had been imposed on by your promises of liberty by equal votes of the people. And at once after the King had been removed from our midst, by Writings and Conferences they were brought into a Government by Oligarchs.

"Truth burst from Rebellion's deepest pit, as men completely opposed to the Monarchy cried out and openly wrote that the Regicide had been wrong and supported by no laws, done by no just authority, that the People had exchanged, not shaken off, their yoke. That they preferred to live under the worst King's Rule for a decade, to one year under the Tyranny of the godly. Their little finger was less unbending than King Charles's loins. When would there finally be an end to this Parliament? They had not undergone, for seven whole years, so many duties of the most difficult military service, to create a perpetual power for their fellow-citizens sitting in Parliament, or to hand themselves over as slaves to their own Delegates. After these complaints came arms, and there was a withdrawal by a sizeable part of the army. But those invited to a Conference were taken by a ruse of the Oligarchs, and the Democrats' leaders were condemned by a military verdict and executed.

"Thus indeed you have curbed the Democrats once or twice, but it is your daily labor to repress the Monarchists. Cavalry squadrons range everywhere to prevent the making of arms: For a free-born People continually shakes off the yoke of foulest slavery with almost complete impatience. Four times within a few months they have just recently resorted to arms in a premature and unhappy struggle; and finally public wishes have induced the King to the justest arms, to whom from all sides fly those pious and brave hearts who have love for the King and, from their hatred of slavery, a contempt for death--sworn with their incomparable King either to free their country from tyranny, or to find an honorable death; and, indeed, they tried it more gallantly than successfully.

"Meanwhile, among the Tyrants the courts seethe with cases of Treason; the jails scarce contain the defendants charged with Treason; the 'limitation on iron chains is unbounded.' Daily the ax and stocks defend this novel Majesty. For some time before this newest paroxysm, all who had formerly followed the King--that is, the many and better--were forbidden to go beyond five miles from home; hence each man's home is practically his jail, the roads are deserted, the towns empty of commerce. The tyranny's hirelings prowl about the crossroads, dangerous to travellers and rough to strangers--strewing widespread damage and fear, dragging away the arms, horses, and even their lords as captives. Hired spies steal into generous homes, injecting public affairs into the conversation to fish up treasons. Behold the face of England, behold its people's liberty, which you guard as chains do captives: such 'Guardians of the liberty of England,' are you indeed, that, not without some prediction, you have taken on the name of a tyranny. Alas, iron hearts, ye men born for your country's ruin: ye vipers who, with the father of the country slain, feed on the mother's viscera. Go, ruin, cast down, and after mangling your country, trample on its miserable remains--you who shall reign as impotently as briefly."

And these are the People's voices, this their far most miserable servitude, to have no end under these "guardians," who, without a perpetual and all-powerful army riding the People's neck, cannot keep their power, created by sheer force of arms--and admit it.

Meanwhile, this unhappy and noble People knows neither to shake off the yoke, nor champ the bit in silence. The very harshness of this most criminal tyranny nourishes apt hopes, as does the royal blood's outcry, finally sure to take divine justice and patience by stern.

CHAPTER IV

The Parricides' Injuries to the Church

We have already finished with the main crime against the Church, for we have heard the People complaining that its Religion is contaminated and taken off. That Religion is the ratifier of the Church, as a People loving Religion is the Church itself. What crimes, therefore, are committed against the English People, are also done against its Church. Nor did it occur to the impious minds of the Parricides what they were dealing with, when they cut down the King and the People-- they were slaughtering the King of Israel and mangling the People of God. That Christ's pure Gospel thrived in England, most acknowledge, some deny. But the Army is the Lerna of all heresies, and the Rebels began every quarrel with the King and Royalists, not about doctrine, but ritualistic trifles. Whence, then, against a King and People professing holy doctrine, came such monstrosity?

Doubtless they never learned that divine saying, Isaiah 11:9, "They shall not injure, neither shall they destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord." Now though I well understand this is a promise of eternal rest, not a command or prophecy of the Church militant, yet no good or sane man will doubt but that the promise does entail the command. For truly, whoever hopes to have a place in that holy mountain of God, from which all ruin and loss are far away, ought, while enjoying this life, with the help of his divine knowledge to take care that he go not about to trample and ruin any man having this holy knowledge, much less the earth full of it. Nor will he put on fierce intentions against the church of God, into whose heart descended that wine-like comparison of Isaiah, ch. 65, ver. 8: Thus saith Jehovah, "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all." God withholds His avenging hand from the sinners of His People, for some new wine of holy knowledge and divine love left in them. Yet the Tyrants have raised their hands against those greatest souls in whom some wine of piety gave off the sweetest odor. For, by immortal God, what piety sweeter, what more fragrant than that of Charles, King and Martyr? You, foulest parricides, have crushed this new wine with your impious heels. You have practiced your cruellest madness against heroic examples of piety toward God, loyalty to the King, and love of the fatherland. You have violated and trampled ministers of the Gospel, and the Ministry itself, you utter scoundrels. I say nothing of the crosses, jailings, confiscations, exiles, and gravest injuries done to other men. But why declare you war on the very Ministry, with fanatic rascals substituted for pious and learned Theologians--rogues never yet seen in a University, who never even met humane or holy learning at the door, who had received no χέλποτον from Ecclesiastical authority? The reason is at hand. Tyranny and its followers, whose minds seethe with the most monstrous crimes, grow pale and tremble at the approach of holy Truth's messengers, and at the sight of them think their parricide and sacrilege is reproached. Nor, indeed, can Truth's heralds keep from proclaiming repeatedly some Truth against these assassins; otherwise, they would preach neither justice nor meekness, which doctrines do indeed quite obstruct the Tyrants' affairs. These bothersome teachers therefore must be removed, this untimely wisdom eliminated: for what have the parricides to do with the Gospel, which agrees not with their Tyranny at all? Prophesiers, loud and obsequious to their masters, must be advanced, whose conscience is never troubled by an awareness of a wrong obedience. Let them bawl out to the People that now the age of gold has shone forth, and the Saints come, divinely sent to hold judgment on the nations, to bind Kings with their chains, and great lords with iron shackles; that the blessed age is nigh, when the godly shall wash their feet in the blood of the wicked and the meek possess the earth. The Kingdom of God would then at last be here, if the Scots were killed to extinction, the King beheaded, and the Monarchy abolished. Whoever recognized King Charles, refused Christ the King. Whence came this doctrine, "Those my enemies, who wished not for me to rule over them, fetch hither, and kill before me." This text we have seen prefixed, of course, to their Anti-monarchical books.

As for the rest, men utterly ἄθεολόγοι busy themselves much indeed about the marks of Election, identifying a certain visibility of the invisible militant Church with themselves, and making Election itself obviously their own function—for they call none the Elect but those they elect. And furthermore, they object to their seeking remission of sins from God, howsoever Christ ordered the contrary; for this would be pointless repetition, and call their Election into doubt.

No sacraments are administered by these men; prudently, too, for they have no faculty to do so; but this is impious, in that they order them omitted as unnecessary, forgetting there is no greater necessity than to comply when God orders. These men the new Republic considers the most faithful Ministers of its Tyranny and, next to its soldiers, the most useful as the messengers of its commands and the heralds of its victories. Ill from these ulcers, these cancers, the Church of England labors miserably, and she feels and groans that her entrails are eaten up, as she calls for the aid of the supreme Physician to cure a supreme evil.

Equal is the injury to what they call the permanent Land of the Church. When the Tyrants stripped the Bishops, Deans, and Canons, they professed themselves unwilling to turn anything consecrated for pious uses to profane ones. Thus the sacrilege was imposed on many pious men of Episcopal grade, yet more on others' lands. It was expected that the wealth seized from the Bishops would be disbursed among the Pastors of Churches where there was great labor and no estate to sustain the holy work--of which churches England had many. How many Hospitals, how many Poorhouses were promised? But after the loot had been heaped up, Tyranny was seen to be a thing of bigger profit if they considered themselves most, and reckoned as put to pious uses what was put to their own. Then--which is these men's piety--they did not wish to summon God to a partnership in the theft; and so they devoured the whole sacrilege themselves.

That, however, they might have many participants in the crime, they enticed the People with easy prices to buy the Church's Lands. The same with the King's patrimony; a sale which, with a price inviting bidders everywhere, adjudged the buyers to the Tyrants' factions--buyers not unjustly fearing that, upon the King's return to his own, they would lose their purchased lands, and with the loss even incur punishment.

Under this tyranny, of course, avarice--always a dire plague to piety--corrupts the Church. For the livelihood of the many necessarily depends on men who command on land and sea, and either possess all the Commonwealth's taxes and emoluments or distribute them at pleasure; wherefore, it is also impossible for these moving enticements of riches not to sway very many who either sympathize with the Tyrants, or pretend they do. Those who affect no party of the Commonwealth are not immune from this force, since nobody is free to carry on commerce, or prosecute a lawsuit, or take a trip, without his reliability being established by an oath to the tyrants.

Nor did this violence pass even the Rustics by. For men, troubled more about cattle and crops than their conscience, were pervaded by a fear that those who refused this oath would be granted no court action against theft. I omit the soldiers--vile souls who regard legality or illegality as of no importance, and measure human and divine law and religion itself by pay and booty.

This utter ruin of the Church, then, came from the rule of the Tyrants, because by the love of their property and by the practice of civil commerce, many were swept away, as if by some torrent, into the evil part. We are ready to say with Nahum, "May the Lord pardon us as often as we incline ourselves in the House of Rimmon."

CHAPTER V

The Parricides' Injuries to God

What injuries the parricides inflicted at home on the King, the People, and the Church, we have thus far seen. Now for those done abroad to the Most High God, to all Kings and Peoples, and especially to the Reformed Churches.

First occurs the most holy divinity of God; and though He knows how to protect Himself and to repulse and avenge an injury done to Him, yet it becomes all who love and worship God to account the injury offered Him as done to themselves, and to receive it with the justest indignation. Nor, indeed, do we undertake to weigh the several sins against God—they have a Judge to call them to their reckonings. Let us not judge another's slave; let them stand or fall before their Lord. For my part, I pray for them a ripe repentance and a merciful Judge.

It pleases us only to pursue the injury to God, which is that of all good men, namely, that God is called to shares of the wickedness, that God is named the patron and author of the foulest crimes; which obviously is the chiefest offence of this Tyranny and the whole sect of the Independents. As nothing to this are the thieveries and homicides, whereby other men appease their avarice or anger, forgetting God and self.

"I'm less offended by a plainer thief."

Truly, for you to mention God in this very crime, so that you seem to draw Him into its fellowship, for you to assign Him the guilt for the deed but yourself the profits, and to weave of piety a huge whole cloth of crime--this belongs to a man who has inwardly extinguished all sense of divinity, unready to do such a thing unless he should believe that God is an empty Μορμολυκειον, whose insubstantial name is safely bandied around; and that a belief in the divine presence and the precepts and warnings of justice are the bogey-men of empty minds. I am quite persuaded that the Tyrants and chief Independents are of this stripe: for indeed (though the closest old foxes) they openly avow this belief, that to have Religion is harmful; to feign it, helpful, for plebeian minds are taken by the handle of piety and drawn in any direction.

Hypocrisy is indicated by the contrarious enthusiasms of these men about Religion, whereby they equally destroy and adore her. For even as they show themselves guilty of the foulest crimes, as they give free rein to a deadly license of monstrous sects while what Religion they profess or confession of faith adhere to, not even they can say: still, they always prattle sanctimony, and commit no crime without a most religious show, the saintly rabble! Both ways, Religion suffers from the Tyrants the same that Christ did from Pilate's soldiers, by whom he was simultaneously cuffed to death and adored on bended knee. The language of their public Proclamations, stuffed with piety, and the similar epistolary style of Cromwell and his Tribunes will indeed move the bile and bitter laughter of anyone who remarks with what impudence these secret gluttons and open thieves disguise their offences with a

Religion which they long ago ordered their affairs to use,

Herein the Parricides truly wrong God twice, in that they make Him both the author and end of their crimes.

They make Him the author when they say the whole furtherance of their crimes was received from divine inspiration. Very often the army's wavering spirits were impelled in the direction Cromwell wished by Hugh Peter, or some alleged "Prophet" with a prediction come down, to be sure, from Heaven. When King Charles I of holy and august memory was held by the Independent army, shortly before his escape to the Isle of Wight, these religious bandits promised the King and Senate responses according as God should have next inspired them; it was imputed to these inspirations, so called, if what they had ratified one day was nullified the next. And the Most Gracious King was heard to complain that "he could expect nothing certain from these men, whose promises today, tomorrow's inspiration would change." And just so did Cromwell reply to those reminding how religiously he had promised the King restitution. "For my part," said he, "I absolutely hold to my vows, but as I was praying and demanding God's help for this work, my tongue stuck to my palate and my voice in my throat--God was suggesting my plan didn't please Him at all." Oh! how these men have God on call, on whom they cast perfidy and parricide, ready to force whatever wrong they do on God, as did that Lover in Terence, "God was my authority--He drove me to it!"

Hereto pertains the fact that the utterly frightful parricide of the most August King was celebrated with many prayers and fasts, that they might inspire the People to believe that the parricides had been led to perpetrate such a crime by the Holy Spirit. For, when asked, would God have denied his Spirit to such pious brigands?

To the same heading belongs the fact that a success beyond the parricides' wishes and a seldom interrupted course of victories are shown as a divine approval of parricide, of sacrilege, and of the whole robbery from the start. And as for us (they say), whom after all you don't recognize, ye adversaries, the busy God whom we zealously invoke maketh a way for us everywhere through opposing troops, He openeth town gates, and equally subdueth lands and seas. God it is who inspireth and likewise protecteth us. Us---the darlings of heaven, the care of the Divinity---for whom He streweth the way to glory over the very necks of Kings!

Away with argumentation worthier of brutes than men! For thus, an Elephant will exceed men in divine favor to the degree that it is superior in strength. But because God's will is urged as favoring the victors, for my part, I acknowledge that God wills to be done, all things which are done. But it does not follow thence, that God approves all things which are done, or agrees with crimes which are committed. For the will of the decree whereby---with God either "willing" or "permitting" it---human actions are done, alters nothing into the will of a command. Nay, many things are condemned by the will of His command, which are done by the will of His decree. If you confuse these, you should commend the betrayal of Judas. For God willed that, and you will open the window to every crime; and all criminals will have means whereby to escape their judgments and bind their judges' hands, as God's will excuses any crime.

But lest you measure the justice of human actions from their success, it is worthwhile to observe what issue, what crimes follow.

"This bore a cross, crime's price; but that, a crown."

Junius Brutus preserved his country by expelling its Kings; another Brutus lost it by killing a Tyrant. Yet perhaps the later Brutus, who slew a usurper, did justly; and the earlier one, who expelled a legitimate King, unjustly. So that one learns that God's providence, most clearly evident in the changes of kingdoms is not bound to the good or bad intent of his instruments in such a way that evil results always come from evil deeds, or good ones from good. Clearly, ensuing success does not make an evil deed good anew, or misfortune make a good deed evil. Consequently, those Christians who prove the justice of their arms by their victories should be sent to school to the Ethnics, who opposed calling successful crime "virtus," or virtue's depending on fortune, and condemned Dionysius, who having escaped that cruellest storm after the plundering of the Delphic temple, declared the Gods favored the sacrilegious. Not unlike this are these temple-robbers, parading their victories as the seal of divine favor for being energetic in destruction of King and Church. But the Ottomans have just such a seal, far more notable--an Empire widespread by prosperous wars through Europe, Asia, and Africa, and now somewhat confirmed by centuries. And they display this success as, to be sure, a divine approval of the Mohammedan sect, and the reward for the extinct or oppressed Christian faith.

Truly, one egg is not more like to another than Cromwell is to Mohammed. For each one--who feigned to be a Prophet and was bringing new light from the heavens; a destroyer of Religion and Laws by a pretense of reformation--in his own nation by a parade equally of piety and war, used a sly sanctimony for the Church's ruin and erection of a new Power. Lest, while superstition transports men's minds and success stirs superstition, that "Mohammed redivivus" introduce to the Western world an ἐνέπριον πλάνης just like the Oriental, may the Church's Preserver and Redeemer forbid great victories!

Here, indeed, the souls of pious and prudent men must be strengthened with every effort against this Epidemic and the very old fallacy of prosperous results. For after you have distinguished more clearly than the noonday sun the goodness of a cause from its success, the mob still embraces the mightier cause as the more just.

"It always follows fortune, hates the lost."

However, thus far the Tyrants' victories in England have obtained a contrary effect. For with their power, the People's hate of them increases. Yet the Tyrants' followers are mere slaves of fortune, whom they worship as a God, and by whom they estimate justice and good, seeing that God, "whose hidden judgments are many, but none unjust" (as Augustine says), all the same very often permits a just cause to be overcome by an unjust. For men are not worthy of better dealing, and just it is that the unjust be repaid with injustice. Wherefore the Prophet (Ps. 109), pronouncing the justest threats against the enemies of Christ and the Church, thus invokes: "Set thou a wicked man over him, let the extortioner catch all that he hath." For God uses evil instruments to ruin evildoers, or from evil to make them good.

Yet there is no reason for those evil instruments, whereby God inflicts just punishments or paternal chastisements, to please Him, or for them to think their wickedness approved by God, because they have obviously managed the matter successfully. But the Independents do this, who usually write their ανδρογαθήματα thus: "In this battle, God acknowledged us for his own; in another conflict, God witnessed us as his people,"--pinning God's love and their own election on the outcome of their battles. That Israel was the People of God by that choice which includes whole nations, nobody doubts. Not only did God acknowledge men as His own, but he approved their cause, too, in the war against the ten tribes of Benjamites. For prior to advancing in battle order, they had consulted God, who even drew up their line and ordered Judah to be put in front. Yet twenty-two thousand Israelites were slain. Dismayed, the people came again to the Ark of the Covenant and asked, whether "I shall go up a second time to fight against my brother Benjamin." God replied, "Go up against him." The second time, however, eighteen thousand Israelites fell. What, therefore, if God claimed them with words, but denied them by deeds? His was the People, His was the cause at stake, His the power that determined it. Yet God wished, because they were His, to chastise His people, whom He made more so by these disasters: the Israelites were strengthened by the two defeats, because taught humility and faith; but the Benjamites were ruined by the two victories, for they were puffed up beyond repentance by vain self-confidence, and in the third conflict slain nearly to extinction. Let this be a lesson that God ordains punishments for crime by neither our condition nor our judgment, and that the justice of a cause and God's love or hate ought not be reckoned by the outcome of battles. For often men fight a war over one controversy, but God brings another one to judgment. Absalom was struggling with David his Father about Supremacy, but God punished David for his homicide and adultery. Often, too, those whom God approved the more, He humbled with great defeats, beginning their chastisement by their own children, while an enemy quite in the wrong, fortunate beyond desires and waxing insolent from victories,

" . . . did prepare aloft

A tower of many tiers, whence steeper got

The fall, a hideous, headlong drop to nought."

We must wait with silence and hope, until God's justice at last fixes an end to the unbridled license of the Independent assassins, whose very Piety makes a reproach to God, crediting Him with their crimes and dragging so many victories, so many dangers overcome, into an agreement of Divinity itself to their crime--as that bandit who, fresh from robbery and murder, slept under an old wall, and saw in his sleep the image of a man arousing him and ordering him to go thence. Hardly had he awakened and left there, when the wall caved in. Escaped, the robber adored God not only as his deliverer, but as the patron of his crime too. Yet the next night the same image appeared to him as he slept, and warned him that he had not been led from the collapsing wall in order to get off unpunished and unharmed, but to be saved for the cross.

Another injury, and related to this, is that the Parricides, just as they make God the author of crimes, so make Him their end too. Well? all these predigious crimes are committed to God's glory: to this end, is the King's sacred head smitten off with the ax, citizens massacred, the Church ruined, Religion all but extinct, an iron yoke and the necessity of perpetual war imposed on the People; and finally, robberies, rapine, treason, perversion of divine and human laws--all are done to God's glory: oh, how holily, with what a religious show of prayers and prophesyings!

We have the character of these men graphically drawn in Isaiah 66: 5: "Your brothers who hated you, who drive you out for my name, keep saying, let the Glory be given to God." For indeed, to God's glory these men commit those crimes, through which God's glory is quite impaired, indeed so far as possible with men. The source of this evil is disclosed in the third section of the same chapter, "These choose their own ways, and their soul delights in their own abominations." and further on in the fourth section, "They have done what appears evil in my eyes, and that wherein I am not pleased." For Religion and God's glory are vainly pretended, when the ways enjoined by God are shunned, and forbidden ones chosen. Not by God's ways but theirs, do these fanatic men weigh out their piety, butchering their own King with the same ceremony as if they duly sacrificed a victim to God. To God's glory also did those Jewish imitators of the Philistines burn boys alive to Moloch, accustomed

"To ask the gods for favor (speech too dire!)

With gore, and lay small sons in altar fire."

Is there anyone of so foolish a mind as to think that by horribly violating God's commands, his glory is looked after; that by parricides, perjuries, and robberies the Kingdom and Justice of God are established, that God himself is won over by crimes? Just as if you were to say that men are filled by starvation, or healed by disease, or grow young with old age. But we don't live in that Prophetic age, that bitter waters sweeten from injected salt, or logs catch fire from a drench of water. God indeed does advance His glory, which is His virtue and wisdom, through its contraries. But men may not seek God's glory, but by those ways which are agreeable to it.

The Independents, however, appear to tell God, "You indeed have ordered that by obeying your commandments, protecting the church, obedience toward Kings, love toward our brothers, fairness and faith toward all, we seek your glory. But another way pleases us, and we are ordered by our prophesyings--far more powerful than your commandment--to kill Kings, ruin the Church, to be fattened with blood and public spoils, to measure justice and faith by convenience, to clothe these crimes with the garb of piety. This seems to us a greater short-cut to your glory: truly, it becomes Thee, since we're unwilling to do what you wish, to will what we wish, and get you glory our way, because yours won't do."

Ah, in a matter so serious, so mournful one is disgusted to jest--the Prophet deals seriously with them: "Woe to them who say good is evil, and evil is good; who decree shadows for light, and light for shadows, bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter. Woe to those who are wise in their own opinion, and perceptive in their own judgments." Moreover, what kind of men the Prophet censures, the preceding words declare: "Woe to those who say, let God hasten, let Him speed His work, that we may see, and straightway let come the counsel of the Holy One of Israel, that we may try it."

These words, in fact, read in the most divine Prophet, cause me to reflect that there are some constellations, as of stars, so of human natures, recurring in the most diverse times and places, and certain appetites for vices, marked with their own characters, which untaught drive dangerously idle men over the same tracks anywhere and at all times. For though the Independents are a rare sample--who dared call the most monstrous parricide and foulest crimes "piety," and stretch God's glory over their crimes--they have their pattern expressed by the holy Prophet two thousand four hundred years before. For what men have bawled out more, "Let God hasten, and speed His work"? Nay, they take on the work of God, they themselves speed His work, they wish it told to their honor that they alone advance God's Kingdom. The plan of the Holy One of Israel had failed, of course, unless these murderers had put their hand to the work. But the same ones say "good is evil" and "evil good," so wise (with themselves the judges) that they assert they knew more fully and better than God what good is, and what conduces to His glory: So that it is wonderful how things quite opposed stay in one place--the greatest quarrel with God's laws, and the greatest passion for His glory.

It is, of course, the custom among men to encrust secret crime with piety. But openly to bring out their crime and it a most frightful one, to call it piety as if to glorify a sacred thing--this truly is a monstrosity unheard-of to many centuries back, and peculiar to the Independents now. Alas, with what praises do they extol that heroic deed of theirs? What thanks, on days publicly set aside to it, do they tender to God for enduing them with virtue to dare and accomplish this! Yea, and that black day, destined to be unlucky for all centuries, on which by unspeakable parricide they had violated their own Best King, they have ordered in this very year 1651 to be observed throughout the Kingdom as a festival, and to be celebrated with public thanksgivings--one doubts whether to insult the whole People in its king's severed head, or to ridicule God's patience.

Tacitus notes (Annales XIV) that "every time the Prince had ordered banishments and murders, the Gods were thanked, and what had formerly been the signs of prosperity, then were those of public disaster." Who does not recognize in Nero's time the character of our own? Except that ours are worse to the degree that it is baser to falsify crimes for good deeds, than disasters for successes. However, each was done according to its time. Of course, what was decreed by Nero's Senate with perfunctory adulation--that crimes be revered as good deeds--is seriously and sedulously bothered about by the English murderers. For Nero's matricide, thanksgivings were offered in all the temples; for Octavia, his murdered wife, gifts for the temples were decreed. These at Rome--what in London? For the utterly abominable parricide against the King's sacred life, thanks have solemnly been rendered to God. Because of the most shameful massacre of good citizens, a day has been proclaimed to be honored with an annual thanksgiving. Thus, what formerly were the signs of virtue and piety are now by a horrible perversion made those of the most infamous crimes; and the greatest ruin of the Kingdom and the Church are assigned first place even to England's prosperity. And, moreover, in this drama the Most High, like some Tragedy-god, is ordered to assume the character of a deus ex machina, and put on the mask of a champion of parricides.

O miserable age, which has suffered these prodigies! Miserable, we who see them! Miserable the assassins who do them, and know not their own misery--how grave, how horrible, how much more atrocious than all crimes and injuries since Creation it is, for them to make the Most High the culprit for parricides, and to refer to Him the beginning and end of their crimes!

This, precisely, is our quarrel with the parricides--that before any repentance for their crimes they dare even to name God's holy name.

Which indeed is God's own quarrel with them and all their likes: For to the wicked man, God saith, "What have you to do with my decrees, that you expound them, or with my Covenant, that you constantly talk of it, when you spurn my discipline, and cast my words behind your back?" Either do penance or abstain from any mention of His holy name. Because you name God, He is insulted; because you speak His Word, you pronounce your own condemnation; because you pray, you increase this, and your speech becomes a reproach unto you.

CHAPTER VI

The Parricides' Injuries against all Kings and Peoples

The Royal Patron has relieved us of this task, and has most brilliantly finished off the whole matter, so that we must either be silent or speak after him. We are not exceeding, then, the duty of our title. Together with the Royal blood, we shall cry out to heaven; but likewise to Kings and Peoples, which after Great Salmasius all should do; as in field or canton it is everybody's business to follow the ravaging wolf with his cry, even more to pursue it with collective arms, and finally to kill it.

Kings therefore must be warned again and again that an attack was made not against the King of England only, but against all Kings, by this heinous parricide. For the Parricides have shown the World that their King can be convicted as a defendant, condemned with the People as the Judge, and be decapitated. This indeed they themselves proclaim, and raise the battle-standard for Peoples to shake off their yoke, and murder their Kings. We have seen and shuddered at writings of these sacrilegious men, bragging "they had freed the World from the old superstition that Kings, liable to none but God, ought to be judged or punished by none but God; that they had given an example salutary to all Peoples, fearsome to all Tyrants." These words Cromwell wrote to the Scots after the battle of Dunbar, and many other tormenters of the same faction have written like words; with such sesame and poppy are sprinkled Milton's infamous pages, just burnt by the hangman of Paris at the order of that city's supreme Senate--would that their Writer had been also!

The Great Chamber has perceived that France's interest is at stake, that this neighboring example is agitating the minds of the French commoners with a too-personal impulse; and that all is over with the Kingdom and Peace and Justice, the sister of Peace, if the fearful belief were to possess men's minds, excitable to revolution, that this dire deed can be tried and achieved because done once; then, prosperous crime and the great profit in outrage (which causes every page in men's undertakings) would be, by this fresh example, stimuli for the factious to attempt the same crime.

The most Eminent Senators, and all the most experienced men around the King, cannot fail to perceive what secret stratagems the English Parricides move among us, that no small part of our disorders are owing to them; that the restless minds of the assassins watch unceasingly that we have no peace abroad or concord at home, knowing that their own fortunes are over and they must immediately plan on the gallows or flight, if chivalrous France could ever use its forces to demand punishment of the Parricides, and to avenge the injury done to the blood Royal of France. They have at home the daughter of Henry the Great, worthy of such a Parent, stripped of her dowry, banished, proscribed, convicted of high treason, bereft of the King her husband (killed through the worst crime), the Mother of orphans driven from their patrimony, against whom war is made and the ax prepared. Of so heroic a woman either the grief or family, certainly her virtue--equal to her birth but above her sex--should move the King, Princes, Nobles, and all France to the justest revenge.

To you, O most insulted King; to You, O Princes of the blood Royal; to Ye, O Nobles, the pillars of French dignity and safety, this Royal aunt appeals. Pity her tears, have regard for her Widowhood, consider her ill treatment; let that most tender sense of honor of yours be stung to the quick with the sharpest points by this completely shameful injury done to the French Majesty and nation, if you especially prize the glory of France, the cause of Kings, and finally your own safety. If you thought the Prince of Mantua, because he was born in France and a suppliant to your King, worthy of being appropriated to his Principate with all the forces of France: What should the Daughter, Sister, and Aunt of your Kings not expect from your kindness and power--alas, a Queen and suppliant at the same time? Of which she procures the dignity of one, and pity for the other, for her demand.

It does not escape me that the duties of Kings are estimated by advantage to the Commonwealth, not by family necessities. Yet we have now shown, you more clearly realize, that this rebellion absolutely leads to the endangerment of France. Whether it be advantageous to either French dignity or security for Kingdoms to be abolished on neighboring shores, for Popular States to arise, for successful examples of parricide and desertion next door to be displayed to the French Commoners--yours be the judgment. Willy-nilly, you will certainly be drawn into war by a necessary choice of commerce or war with a neighboring race of growing naval might, whose power to recognize or Envoys to receive, the French spirit will never brook. It were wiser, then, to attack while they are scarcely well settled into the administration of their new-found dignity, are struggling with domestic hates, and impeded with the Scotch and Irish war; to attack while the King's gore, spilled by impious parricide, is still warm and the People, not yet trained to Tyranny, breathe the justest wrath and vengeance. Only let not the fact that she was born in a Royal household and mistress of a Royal husband prevent the wrong received by Henry the Great's daughter from being avenged by the military troops of her own kinsmen, an injury which in a private family kinfolks and relatives, as nature and duty demand, would long ago have avenged with their collective forces.

To the injury against Kings is added no less an injury against Peoples. Assuredly, as the English Parricides have taught Peoples what they can dare against their Kings, what profit they can hope from this, they also have given Kings a lesson as to where the indulgence of Kings inclines a People--a People which is too powerful dares anything. A King is not loved by his subjects unless he is feared. A King's safety is ill trusted to a People, whose hatred of rulers is innate. How Peoples are disposed toward Kings is evident only when they have them in their power, and are incited by the ease of committing a crime: Whereof some things true, some increased to a greater degree by distaste for the recent crime, could change the paternal feelings of Kings toward their nations, and thrust Peoples into miserable slavery; as Princes, for the crime of another's subjects, adverse to demands of their own, deny their People lawful things lest they dare those unlawful, and interpret to perfection all things which smack of the liberty of free-born men.

I pass over the fact that the injuries which are done to a King touch the People more. For truly, those who have taught Peoples to shake off their Royal yoke and to violate their own Kings, have advised them worst, and have shown them the way whereby, under a false pretence of liberty, they are going to destroy their liberty and safety.

But what injury (say the Parricides) have we done to free Peoples, unless the injury be to have given them allies for liberty? And the Federated Provinces of Belgium are shown, free of their former King, and doubtless ready to embrace neighbors following their own tracks.

I, however, maintain that by this desertion and parricide the Belgian Federation was injured most of all; especially since the Independents are not ashamed to compare their own vilest parricide with the Belgians' Heroic deeds for liberty. Did the Dutch (if the matter be deeply considered) at any time have a King--or a Count? some federated Provinces had a Duke.

With a Count or Duke there is no supreme authority, and no power of life and death, except as divided with the People. For as, when the empire fell, the power of Counts or Prefects grew in; thus the minds of the Provinces arose to liberty; and having gained the greatest immunities, the states divided Majesty with their Count.

This arrangement of the Commonweal--confirmed by many centuries, the inheritance of the Provinces (descended to Kings by a complex series of marriages)--should not have changed. But Spanish pride knew not how to share power with free peoples, nor would the absolute King of the greatest nations bear to act as a Count with the Dutch or Frisians.

The King, then, thought to rule all his subjects in a Royal way, forgetful that all were not his by the same law; and not thinking that sailors and peddlers would be minded to weigh a Prince's rights and People's privileges in their scales instead of butter and cheese; much less that, against a King who encompassed the Rising and Setting Sun within the limits of his Empire, these narrow Provinces would contend for their liberty with arms.

But oppressed by a truculent tyranny, the Federated peoples--after many thousands had been killed according to no laws but at the mere will of Royal servants over the matter of Religion, while the Prince himself dwelt in other lands, immersed in other cares--finally decided with arms to defend their rights, Religion, Laws, Fortunes, and their Liberty, dearer than life; unconcerned about Treason, nay, negotiating with him who, if he had any Majesty according to the constitution of the Commonwealth, should have divided it with them.

Neither Spanish power nor their own insignificance deterred them from such an undertaking. But what was right and what was theirs first having been ascertained, they seemed to themselves quite strong enough against the forces of Tyranny, as if their only business had been what would be just, not how they could find a way to protect it; so that it is less strange for such a thing to be completed than tried.

After the war started, the principal delay to peace conditions was injected by their Religion, which the King neither could by the Commonwealth's laws put down, nor would allow different from the Roman. But the Federated peoples would not abandon their own, no divine or human law demanding this. And the Spaniard finally had this reward for his superstition and tyranny: that after a seven-years war, with Spain bereft of soldiers and both Indies exhausted of riches, he bought peace from the Federates with the loss of those very Provinces; and by his abdication, ordered the Federated peoples to be independent.

What is the madness of the English parricides beside this virtue, whether you estimate the causes of war, or its purposes and methods? Did they have a Count imposed on them? Or a King with no Majesty to divide with the People? The Parricides, of course, will have it so; but even this one thing proves the contrary: that Parliaments were called and dissolved at the King's will: for without Parliament, the King had sole and solid power; without the King, Parliament had none. Had the King seized the People's rights, had he forbidden the Reformed Religion, or, when asked, had he refused to repair the Commonwealth's damages? Nay, in one thing did the holy King sin against the People--that he conceded them too much, and by impairing his own rights lost his power of deciding well for his People. Indeed, by his fairness and affability he so moved the Federated Provinces, which he had chosen as witnesses to this discord, that around six years ago in a notable Rescript they praised the King's justice, and accused the Parliament-men of unfair demands and harshness. But when the traitors had indeed almost reached the summit of crime and the King's judges had been chosen, what pains did not those most Potent Orders bestow to save the King's sacred head from the assassins' knives, with both prayer and a price offered also? The Federates struggled for their fatherland's laws--the English butchers against Laws. The former defend the Reformed Religion, the latter subvert it. The Dutch employ their liberty--with their former King willing, yes, praying--so that whatever sin against law and justice there had been in arms (which never protect justice without simultaneously violating it) is forgotten forever, and the full rights of Majesty are given to the Federated peoples by either cession, or donation, of the King. The only law unto the new-found "Majesty" of the English rebels, however, is license gained by the monstrous parricide of their holy King, which all ages will condemn, and all nations pursue with the justest denunciation.

Yet the most Potent Orders received Ambassadors from this latest Republic, as if sent by a legitimate power. But he who would strain the public commerce of the Federated peoples with these assassins into an approval of their crime or authority, knows the customs of Imperial or Royal or Popular states imperfectly. Not to mention that the somewhat narrow bounds of the Ethical discipline are broadened by the Political, ordering the People's welfare to be the supreme Law.

Obviously, all association in human affairs will perish, if one must deal with none but the good. The mutual and natural necessity, whereby God has (so to speak) connected nations by a common bond, does not expect legitimate Governments to exist wheresoever commerce is carried on.

Yet how unwillingly the most Potent Orders thought those butchers worthy of even a conference, the Parricides themselves made clear, complaining everywhere of the delays and interferences by which their Ambassadors, after waiting long and vainly on the treaty, were finally compelled to leave with the negotiations unfinished; the leaders in the supreme Council of the Federated peoples roundly declaring (as the Parricides themselves say and write) that they would not make a treaty with the English Republic to the detriment of King Charles; and at the same time these leaders argued King Charles had been negotiated with, as King of England. Next, the sending of Envoys to the new Republic was considered coldly, that it might be clear that negotiations were protracted on purpose by the Federates, and that they wished neither a treaty nor a war with these hangmen, even granting their good faith. If it is so, it showed the greatest prudence.

The Belgians' feeling toward the Parricides was more clearly shown by the People than by the Senate, whose advantage from pretending and need of dissembling was greater. Indeed, the Dutch People—who usually call a vessel a vessel, and a spade a spade—at once pronounced the Ambassadors and their hirelings to be thieves, traitors, and parricides. Joyful it was to see with what derision, what danger those gallows-bait Ambassadors were daily afflicted; not only by the English Royalists and French, but most of all by the Dutch, angry that assassins dripping with their King's gore dared clasp hands with them, and compare robbery of the most wicked sort to Belgian virtue and liberty. And though that nation, long used to the unusual, marvels not at new forms of bird and beast from either of the Indies, the people flocked in stupefaction to this monstrosity greater than all monsters--a Legation from the murderers of their own King had landed on the Dutch coast; the Parricides were daring to show their shameless faces beyond their own shores; they had come, with an aspect of Majesty, to lie about atheism, Religions, and Robbery. The people longed to know whether they were tigers or hyenas, or half-men and half-beasts born of Incubuses and Vampires. The unrestrained indignation of the people was hardly checked by the harshest Edicts, and by extra bodyguards for the Envoys, from tearing these foulest butchers in pieces. No home was quite safe for the Ambassadors, there were traps everywhere, whether public hatred laid them or those souls seething with crimes fancied them; and therefore they would suddenly change residences, but panic and the lash of a torturing soul would accompany the guests to their new guest-homes. Twice or thrice, homes were besieged; as they would come forth, there were dire--and after outcries were forbidden by Edict--silent threats, fierce glances, and hateful expressions. Amazing, that Ambassadors--a sacred name among all nations--had need to be defended by Proclamations and bodyguard in a free and hospitable Republic wherein Turks and Moors securely go about, protected by public honor. Yet the Belgians, French, English, Germans, and all the European nations which reside among the Dutch, would not bear for the sacred right of embassy to be usurped by these dreadfulest parricides, and for the enemies of all mankind to enjoy any international law. They were grumbling, too, at the brigands' being rescued from public vengeance and stoning.

CHAPTER VII

The Parricides' Injury to the Reformed Churches

We now must plead our case, whom this injury supremely touches. But the Parricides cry out, "We do an injury to you, whom we haven't even considered?" Yet we should have been considered. It would have been amazing, though, for those men to remember us, who forget God and themselves. We have already mentioned the principal wrongs done to God and Religion: truly, these injuries are done to us. What a stain they have put on the Holy Gospel, with how much odium the Reformed Profession labors because of their crime, everyone understands and we feel. It is well that the same thing is recognised and felt by the leaders who first fought with them. Of these, Edward Massey the Tribune, who now devotes outstanding efforts to his King, laments in print that "for these men's crime and hypocrisy our Religion is hissed out by neighboring countries, and reeks among our enemies; nay, Reformed Churches everywhere hide their face for shame." These are his words, and these all men admit, friend and foe alike, who have any prudence.

The Romanists, of course, greedily seize this opportunity to jeer that "Surely this is the Religion which brings the Reformation to heaven for us. These are the men who shout that the Pope usurps power against the crowns and lives of Kings--obviously so that they themselves may use a power seized from the Pope against their own Kings. When did Reformed piety appear with a greater show? When did impiety commit crimes worse than this piety?"

The Romanists would proffer these words with less ferocity, however, if they were to recall that those very few men who quit us went over to their camp and borrowed weapons of them, and that the Independents cannot be condemned, without their Jesuit Doctors being convicted as Regicides. They should remember also that the horrible parricide of Jacques Clement, the assassin of Henry III, was extolled by Pope Sixtus in a full Conclave of Cardinals, whence the doctrine of parricide is confirmed by the head of the Roman church and faith; yet all the Reformed Churches loathe the deed and doctrine of the English Parricides (who are extremely few)--which they have testified by public writings.

Indeed, our French churches looked out exceedingly well for the honor of Religion and themselves when, five years before commission of the Parricide, they outlawed the sect of Independents by an express Canon of the National Synod. And we supremely desire this: that it be known to all, and it be our common talk, that for those malicious ones who ascribe the Independents' crimes to us, we have the most complete answer ready--"They are not ours, whom we expelled from a full Synod a long time ago as dangerous."

How hostile they are to the Reformed Religion, they themselves have made public, who condemned the King, a most constant Defender of the Reformed Faith, as an Heretic and a Papist. Yet the King at his very expiration professed the faith which we profess: For a difference in Discipline pertains not to the faith.

But even granting that they were our own men, ought our Religion be convicted of the crimes for which they are justly infamous? No more, certainly, than the Roman Religion should be of the slaying at Naples just recently of Duke Maciniello, and of every sedition in Italy, Sicily, and Spain. Human affairs do not fare so well that Religion immediately makes all who profess her religious; and anyone takes an absurd way, who would judge of Religion by men's wickedness, when he ought to convict men's wickedness by Religion. Religion is not bad because men are evil, but men are evil because they have not faithfully imbibed good Religion. Since both Reformed and Romanists acknowledge these true, the man who burdens Religion with the crimes of men is trying not to declare truth but stir hatred, unless he likewise shows that the very principles of Religion pave the way to crime.

Whatever the Religion to which they devote their piety, the general complaint of all the pious should be that the savage minds of today's men are not tamed by Religion; that the Gospel trumpet is unheard amidst the horns of war; that nowhere is there the Christian mildness which overcomes evil with good, wrests weapons from the angry, and gains the better victory from patience; that public quarrels are undertaken, not according to justice and goodness, but the ambition and profit of a few men; that with everything burns; that everywhere the Majesty of Laws and the safety of Princes is endangered; everywhere a criminal war or treacherous peace.

"Guile, betrayal, crime, and lust and wrath"

These--since they should be assigned to the fate of the times and the natural fierceness and impatience of Western nations--you would attribute to Religions wrongly. Because every faction shows them, they all refer them to their own interests, and fit them to their private profits.

We, then, grant this favor and request it in turn, that men's crimes be not charged to Religion; certainly, that the crimes of the Independents be not forced upon the Reformed--for we do not fasten the Mohammedans' evil deeds to the Romanists. Nay, the Independents are hostile to us, nobody more; we in turn are alien and suspect to them, as ones who hate their parricidal doctrine and fanatic excess "worse than dog or snake"; and we have made known by a public Canon that we have no dealings with them.

How insignificant they account us, or, rather, how they wish us utterly ruined, they have testified by their most infamous parricide. Even while they were preparing for the parricide, they were warned very often that the horrible project immensely displeased all the Reformed Churches, their different beliefs from which, the Romanists do not admit, but put all those differing from the Pope together in one bundle; they were warned that from so horrible a deed the utmost, unjust aversion would be formed for all the Churches abroad--for a good many, even danger; that everybody would charge the Reformed with ever-busy Mystagogues of divers rites, and credit parricide to the Genius of their Religion, as one hateful to the life of Kings, and hostile to all powers--what would those who beheaded the Defender of the Reformed Religion do to a King of the opposite faith? We do not choose to press what acts were done by the malicious for too much silver in this matter, and of which these assassins were diligently reminded before the crime's commission. You would expect, of course, that those who had decided to slay their own King, would have consideration for men over seas. On that account indeed, it was most pleasing to the Parricides that the odium of a few men's crime extend to all; that there would be others at hand to carry such a burden of hatred with them--perhaps even some to turn the impudence of the deed into justice. What if, inflamed by a foreign parricide, Princes should take measures more oppressively against the Churches subject to them? This assuredly they do wish, that all churches by which they are accused of fanatic lust utterly perish: Nor do men who have ruined their own, wish other churches to be safe.

You foulest outcasts, are we, whom you have exposed to punishment and extirpation for your crime, thus worthy of you? Do we seem to you to have heads of squashes that we might produce as substitutes for your crime? Yet how great an evil you shall have brought on yourselves from those whom you have so miserably despised and laden, undeserving, with the hatred for your crime, you shall feel, O shameless Brigands, if ever our King--more advanced in virtue than years and now in his glorious ascendancy, and destined to avenge his family injuries and those common to all Kings--shall arm us for your destruction.

CHAPTER VIII

That all pious men should attack this parricide with the utmost severity, and raise the Royal blood's outcry to heaven

This, indeed, has already been shown. To have set these crimes before men's eyes is enough for a decision as to the vengeance owed. But somehow it might be objected that this vengeance is not our business, and that this vehemence hardly agrees with Christian mildness; and though I have already met the latter objection, I will frankly declare here that this asperity is quite contrary to my disposition. Not once, as I have run this course, has this consideration impeded me: Why do I dwell upon the Church's sore? Why do I prosecute others' enmities? Is this gently to point the way to the erring? Is this to cultivate brotherly love? Yet indeed after I have reviewed both the matter and myself by the standard of Christian duty—which is contained in the two commands, "Love thy Lord with all thy heart, and thy Neighbor as thyself"—I find that I must love God above all things, nay, Him only; my Neighbor, indeed, because of God; and that the second command subserves the first, and yields to it when occasion demands. Therefore, if any man wars on God and plainly opposes His word and glory, if he destroys the Church, if he beheads the sacred Vicars of God, if he perverts Religion to Parricide—him, truly, as an enemy, we both may and ought to pursue and punish with all our forces. Thus David—"Do not I hold those who hate thee, O Jehovah, in my detestation?"

Since, however, the first command of love obstructs not the second, rather, they support each other; we ought never to strain a quarrel for God so very far as to extinguish love toward our neighbor. For he who says "I love God," when he shall hate his brother, is a liar. Wherefore, a Judge ought to love even the criminals whom he condemns to death, and the soldier his enemies who stand in battle, with arms maintaining the most wicked cause; he not using force further than his own and public safety demands; as an imitator of God, who "in His anger, remembers compassion."

And herein I am disposed to lament the dire plight of humanity, but most especially of the Church, which has need of these cautions, to love those it fights, and to slay and destroy those it loves; though how many are there who, in quarrels which are undertaken because of God or country, restrain themselves within this most unhappy moderation, and are not borne with billowing sails of hate against their adversary, though a brother in Christ? Thus Coke, the King's prosecutor, wished the holy King had ten thousand necks, that all might be foreshortened one by one; and often cursed him headlong into Hell, quite as if he would follow his opponent all the way to the Infernal regions, as Brutus did Aruns in Florus. Ah, someday, after Satan has at last been trampled under our feet and all enmity finished, brothers in Christ will mutually understand and embrace each other, and the God of peace will be all in all!

Now I who could seem too aroused in this cause, so exhale brotherly love—even while I attack those Parricides so immensely injurious to God and the Church--as to pray God continually for their safety and conversion; and if anyone of God's family lies hid in this scum, blinded by perverse errors, I beseech him to join with me in prayers to Christ, the common center of the faithful, and in exhalations of divine love.

But because the secrets of Election are hidden but men's crimes open, it is not ours to abandon, lest we wound some unknown brother, the defense of truth and the Church, whereon through the parricides' crime a great stain is cast: We must indeed prosecute them the more harshly because in the middle of their crime, even dripping with their King's blood and falling upon their next one with the sword, they dare ingratiate themselves with us, and familiarly invite us to their side, as long-time sharers of the same doctrine. And the scoundrelly Milton bustles about this, whose expiatory madness I should have mentioned as it deserves, had I not scrupled to sally forth into the province of Great Salmasius, to whom victory over this truly great adversary should be completely left. How does one treat these assassins who, though they separate all churches from themselves (were Independents as they are called) and load themselves with the gravest offenses despite everyone's vain resistance, yet dare extend the odium of their crimes to their denouncers and opponents? Ho! ye Independents, keep your crimes for yourselves, and ye who taste your wit by yourselves, be witless by yourselves too.

One must, of course, deal gently with the erring, so long as there is hope of returning to the way; and refutation of error ought to be made without insult to the erring. You will vainly bludgeon, then teach with salutary precepts. By mildness you should make receptive and tranquil the mind into which you would induce the serene image of Truth; a mind, which you have previously upset with invective, hardly receives her.

It is another inducement to gentleness when evil grows, or something has been committed which cannot be undone, which, however, it were better to hide than to disturb. You will more advisedly cover the sores of the Church, than enlarge them by rubbing: There are plenty of adversaries to bare and exasperate them. Truly, it does not become us to perform our adversaries' duty.

These two things I examined and diligently considered before directing my mind to this book. But neither of them enjoined upon us liberality or silence toward these parricides. That there is no profit by liberality the most August King discovered, slain by them, he who not only by liberal words but especially deeds animated them to this deadly madness, as patience usually adds courage to innocence. In vain were so many warnings of piety and right reason by Theologians and men of all orders before the crime was committed: After its commission, however, they took courage from the crime itself, and one crime imposed a long necessity of crimes. And so he wastes his pains who offers reason or mildness to the parricides, most disgracefully drunk with the sweet fortune of wickedness; and does not know the Anabaptist disposition, which assuredly the cross alone can recall to good sense, if anything can.

They have not left silence to us, themselves proclaiming their own crimes. Nor did they wish the parricide concealed, which they committed as the world gazed on, and, after its commission, protected with arms and writings, and commended to all Peoples for imitation.

Since, then, we are not free to cover up these ulcers, but extenuation of the crimes would be to come into a partnership of crime; and they themselves try to rub off their crimes on us and add their misdeeds to the sacred truth which we profess: Especially since the Romanists connect us with those monsters as equals, I, for my part, think that kindness toward them and silence about their most famous crimes is absolutely ἄλογα καὶ ἄκαιρα; truly, for us even shameful and ruinous. Enough has been conceded to brotherly love, enough to Christian patience, especially toward those who, that they may not see as brothers or Christians but depend on themselves only, have broken every chain of brotherhood and have drawn out the bowels of Christian compassion; not sparing their King, their fellow-citizens, nor lastly their God, whose name they most shamelessly abuse every day, adding to monstrous crimes a drama of hypocritical piety; trampling the Lord's Vineyard with dirty feet and uprooting it; bringing disgrace to the Sacred profession, reproof to its doctrine, ruin to its Ministers, and destruction to the Ministry itself--assassins of Kings, corrupters of Laws, the ready destroyers (for they say as much) of all Monarchs of the Christian world. If any one of our brethren thinks we are dealing heartlessly with these τρισκατάρτοις,--of all wild beasts the cruellest, the enemies of God and men--while they are attacked with the harshest denunciations, I say that he indeed is heeding neither the matter nor himself. For the business has come to the point that we either ought to admit our community with their deeds and doctrine, as the Romanists wish; or, by speeches and writings, we must banish the doctrine of these men as far as possible from us, avert it, and attack it with our entire detestation and finally drive it away.

When then? They are not simply parricides, but turn parricide into a doctrine; and they take this from an agreement of the Reformed Churches, but indeed they dare not defend it by the Revealer of them. "It was" (says the debauched Milton) "the opinion of even the greatest Theologians, who were the very authors of the Reforming Churches." He means, of course, one Scot, who kept himself in his own Scotland, whom his age did not put up with, and who in this matter was condemned by all the Reformed, especially the French. But that gallows-bird uses the plural number to extend the blame to all, and into the Reader ignorant of these things, to inject the suspicion that this monstrosity belonged to the reformation of the Church. It is well that they have but now testified their zeal toward Monarchy; and that, the right of Kings, liable to none but God, has been defended by Salmasius and Bochart, great names; which work Molinaeus and Rivetius also did brilliantly before. What men! What lights of the Church! Why should I recall our other notable men who have thundered against these parricides with the justest wrath--Vincent, Herald, Porree?

Men equally learned and prudent had recognized that our Church and Religion itself were oppressed by this most unjust and very grave odium, and that neither could otherwise be defended than by denouncing the horrible deed and hellish doctrine with supreme indignation. And so they brought timely assistance to Religion and the laboring Church. These and other decisive helps we await from the Most High God, who is the Father of Kings and the avenger of His truth, who demands back his temples and hears the outcry of innocent blood.

The Royal Blood cries out indeed; and until it calls down vengeance from heaven, through us it will cry out to heaven, it will cry out with the voice of the whole Church militant, and the Church triumphant: "Arise, God of vengeance, arise at last, kindle a zeal for thy glory, and awaken thine ancient compassions. Lo, wicked robbers ascribe their parricides and thieveries to thee; they call thee the author and end of their crimes; they propitiate thee with the blood of their King; every crime hateful to thy sacred eyes and forbidden by thy law, alas, they glorify with the profoundest imitation of piety. They do not hesitate to employ even thy purest Word, miserably distorted for the protection of their impurity; next, condemned by thy Word, to feign the inspiration of thy Spirit to patch up anew thy just, immutable, eternal laws, and fit them to the profits of Tyrants. These things thou beholdest, Most Holy Judge, and thou seest how great an opprobrium adheres by these deeds to thy truth, what occasion the profane seize therefrom to call Religion a mask and Piety a farce; what opinion the weak form, that these crimes are pleasing to thee, as being approved by good fortune as by the seal of thy favor. Amidst these, all those whose mind is sound and truly pious, and who are brought by a sacred ardor to thy glory, unhappily groan, under a monstrous weight of horrible opprobrium, forced on thy name, Religion, and the Church; and waste away with hidden sorrow, oppressed by grieving hearts; some, impatient and rash, even break out into murmurs; Others, too, from thy patience with these crimes, wrongly learn to become habituated to crimes.

"And this anxiety, in fact, burns to the quick thy servants who are nothing concerned with England, burning with zeal for thy house, and bearing an unfair reproach for thy gospel. But for the English, however, to this grief has been added a Tyranny most dangerous to bodies and souls; a Church ruined at home, a Ministry well-nigh extinct, a King slain by unspeakable parricide, and, after the father's murder, the same ax destined for his son; Laws violated, Rights trampled, inheritances plundered, everywhere bloodshed, mourning, and the most miserable slavery; and while the gibbet, exile, and want are the rewards of virtue and faith, the traitors reign alone, and in the midst of thy sheep-folds the wolves safely glut their foul maw with the blood of the flock.

"But that this unhappy nation does indeed deserve these and all punishments for its sins, we have no doubt whatever. But thou, most Merciful God, art not wont to measure the punishment of thy people by the merit of the sin, but by the usefulness of that people; and not by the vice of culprits, but by repentance art thou delighted. Hear at last, O Lord, the groans of thy penitents, and to the end that their liberation may be speeded, ripen and perfect their repentance. Yet the compassion which men's penitence cannot deserve, may the merit of Christ obtain, and the consideration of thy glory win for a most miserable people. For though men are worthy to die, yet worthy art thou to be worshipped by them, and to be magnified for the miracles of thy clemency; worthy also is Christ to exercise in England a salutary reign, free from the fanatic excess of men dangerously idle, and the power of Satan feigning to be an angel of light. Truly, as our great and only hope for an ailing England, there remains the consideration of thy glory, which, O supreme Judge, appeals to thy justice, sure someday to hear the outcry of a murdered King, of violated Religion, and of the crushed Church; to break open the murkiest recesses of wicked hypocrisy, and to drag [wickedness] forth to the fearful light of thy judgment. Vindicate at last, O Most High, thy Word, Spirit, and Providence from so many crimes, whereof those Parricides blush not to make thee the defender. Indeed, they make a pretext of thy Word and Spirit, relying, however, on their victories' testimony alone, alas, too effective on plebeian minds. Do thou therefore, O God of hosts, with arguments drawn from the same source, prove that a piety encrusting crimes utterly displeaseth thee; that evil findeth no place with thee, though painted with whatever colors; that thou dost abominate the bloody and deceitful man; that thou art the parent of Kings, the defender of Truth and Justice, the Father of the Church's household, and that the outcry of innocent blood hath reached thee. At last may the inflexible obstinacy of the traitors soften at the rays of thy Truth. May the righteous rejoice at the brilliant glory of thy Justice. May men everywhere say, 'Truly the just man has his reward, truly God is the Judge of the earth.'

"And because Kings are thine, O Christ, the characters and assistants of thy Glory and Justice; divinely endue, O King of Kings, thy vicars Louis and Charles with wisdom, strength, and fortitude, and the full Genius of thy Virtue.

'These Youths to succor perverse times with help,
Do thou propitious bid'

"Let their enemies be shamefully confounded; but above them, may the crown flourish. Make them everywhere magnificent victors, the beneficent parents of their people, the avengers--equally loved and feared--of Justice and Piety; may they reign by the power and virtue of Christ, and Christ by their governance and ministry."

That we may protect our work with a good and great name, and that this detestation for a horrible deed may be supported by a great author, I have been pleased here to add some small pages from an Epistle to Dr. Morley by our most illustrious Bochart who, being justly cherished and looked up to by all, can, alone worth them all, speak the consensus of the French Churches.

For our part, at the first news of the crime's perpetration, "cruel horror encompassed" us. Next we gave ourselves over entirely to tears and sadness, and with public and bitter mourning we paid honors to the soul of your King. It was disgusting to us for the greatest and holiest King--and one most favorably disposed toward us--to have perished by so unworthy a kind of death, in his prime, having suffered from his own subjects, after such large concessions liberally granted them, things which not even the cruelest enemies would have attempted. We were afraid, too, that the savagery of the deed committed by them, whom the vulgar think to profess the same Religion as we, would cast on our Churches a stain which no age would efface, and that personal vices would be attributed to our doctrine. That we might forestall this evil, the most renowned Pastors in the whole Kingdom of France, alike privately and from the pulpit, with one voice denounced this crime as diametrically opposed to the rules of the divine Word; diligently they warned their flocks to be on their guard against this ferment, and not to take for an example the crime committed by those whom, by an express Canon, our National Synod long ago outlawed. Some even unfolded their judgments in Latin writings, as the most celebrated Pastor of Rochelle, Vincent, and just recently our Herald, the distinguished pastor of Alencon. Another also of as great a name in England as among us, who in the French translation's Preface to the Petition of XLVII Pastors of London, says that "after the crucifixion of Christ, no more atrocious crime has been committed anywhere, and the whole Earth is shaken by it, and good men provoked to a grief destined to last clear to the end of the world." But others as well, beside the Pastors, did not fail their duty. In this very matter, those most eminent men the Sieur de Petiville and the Sieur de Brieux, those most virtuous Senators--the former some time ago in Metz, the latter recently in the Chamber at Rouen--with the most elegant verses held due ceremonies for your King, whereby they heartily cursed the assassins' inhuman cruelty. And the Physician of Rouen Porée, the most pleasing Interpreter πολλῶν αὐτάξειος ἁλλων of the Royal work, did the same most copiously in his Epistle to your King, and Preface to the Reader, prefixed to his version.

May, but a long time before the deed, the Pastor at Geneva, known everywhere, the μακαρίτης John Deodati, had by an Epistle put out on the English affairs called on the Leaders of Parliament to show their King obedience. And David Blondal, marked no less by purity of habits than by nearly infinite reading, had reproached the Scots Pastors by name, in his Preface to the Rectors of Churches, to the Apology for Jerome, dated 15 March 1646, with these words: "Refute harsh words by Christian modesty, pacific counsels, and perpetual examples of the observance of your faith toward Royal Majesty." And likewise: "Convinced by repeated experiments, let the World confess that it is not true or necessary now, nor ever has been, that those who suffer Bishops unwillingly, more unwillingly suffer Kings; that those who admit no Bishops, do not willingly heed Royal power; for none more than those who have no Bishops as diocesan overseers and almost as Kings, have believed and do believe, and teach by their words and deeds, that their King is first after God, and thus second to no man, lesser than God only; and by this very fact set above all men of the Realm." And finally, our Herald, whom the Londoners with difficulty had gotten from us by their entreaties, when (having tried to repress seditious voices and recall those estranged from faith and obedience) by that liberty he had come to danger of his life, he was compelled with changed sail to return anew to his own people.

I might offer more of this sort, but this is more than enough.

To Great Salmasius,

For the Defensio Regia,

A Thanksgiving

Ode

THUS let the Muse encircling all Earth's zones
And able well to speak with hundred tones,
On adamant, O Great Salmase,
Inscribe thy name and sing thy praise.

O where with crowns oppos'd on either side
The Skies intrepid mariners do guide,
Surpassing far, Great Muses' Priest,
The nearest to thee--fame increased,

Thou dost (a marvel!) make one hesitate,
If thou art Hero better or more great,
Whom kindly Godhead doth arouse,
With stupefied and anxious cause,

To this our Globe's prosperity defend
And rights of Princes with a Princely pen.
Whom Gallows-birds without a name
Have learnt, themselves not knowing shame,

What you could do by your own Mars, and where Your Genius with Law's bolt might hurl a spear,
And how in championing Liege Lords
You charged into the shields and swords.

Ah, it rejoices one to see those fiends
With molars smash'd, a stout right's blow the means,
And, as the cestus' stroke falls worse,
Like knave to spit out bloody curse.

'Tis good to see those Hell-hounds clank their chains
To no avail, stiff necks resisting strains,
Whilst you drag them to hated light,
Displaying Herculean might.

How good before the Highest Judge to see
These crimes weigh'd in the scales of piety,
These enemies as culprits tried,
The age's wrack and ruin beside.

And so, 'twas time at last with such a shield
That potent Monarchs had to be conceal'd,
Whom wicked fury might consume
On Earth, as shown by Charles' doom.

Than who no lamp more splendid only late
 Hlas'd forth upon a world in evil state,
 And in the Sky no Stars adorn
 With purer light the Heaven-borne.

O let the luster of a tarnish'd name
 Thee, Law and Order's Parent, now inflame!
 Arise Avenger, and with hand
 Crown crimson spear th' impious band:

In good cause bad tormentors thou dost main,
 Who to their own professions prove a shame,
 In piety (alas!) they gorge
 On crime that penance cannot purge.

Turn hither arms, here wraths, O Potentates
 Who exercise the office of the Fates:
 Turn ye away this pestilence.
 Ye ought t'effect deliverance

From horrid monsters to a World that weeps
 Bent double under crime's stupendous heaps:
 Uproot, squeeze out this noisome pus,
 The guilty Parricides, Earth's dross.

Ye spirits in high enterprises sage,
Ye spears (as pens keep spurring) vent your rage,
Until against the common foe
Public arms are made to go.

Now curses, Muse, now flames I leave behind,
And barbs with hooks to turn loose disinclin'd,
By which the Hell-hounds I send down
To Master Flute, and confound

To mother Earth their sons, whom I! Enough--
I've branded crimes upon their foreheads rough:
With vinegar and many salts
Chaf'd painfully these cankerous faults:

And soon, with foot unbound, that stage I've done.
But potent and--the Hydra slain--alone,
O Great Saumaize, a triumph star,
Afoot we trail the victor's oar.

Against that Deprav'd Wretch

JOHN MILTON

Of Parricides and Parricide

the Advocate

WHERE, where, O Fierce Iambics, do you speed, Unbid on hurried foot? To crush, indeed,
The Giants' obscure spawn into the mire
As he with envy's tooth gnaws at the Sire
Of Letters, even Kings. I touch this bane?
This sore?--Faith, Sir, it does my conscience pain
That I be stain'd by touching gallows' fare
Whom, save with hook, the guard can scarcely bear-- Nose held--to touch or drag to Tower Stair?

Yet though I do abstain fastidious hand,
Let me not suffer thee, O scoundrel damn'd,
To 'scape reproach gain'd by thy villainy.
You, Floggers, seize this wretch of base degree
Straightway, and quickly truss him hand and foot--
I owe a solemn rite of lash and boot.
Do thou this people's crown and Senate's stay
First prick with goads along the destin'd way
For gallows' fruit; make soft his perjur'd pate
With club, and him to scourges designate.
By lashes make his back be one great sore:

You'd quit now?--Rather, cut him up the more
 Whilst he in tears sheds bile, corruption, gore.

Then order thou this great politic Sage (His back in wormlike welts from flogging's rage,
 A tasteful, varied pattern left by switch)
 Before Salmasius' feet with soles to pitch.
 May he smite thee with greater punishment,
 Deprav'd buffoon! Just as th' innocent
 (Unlike thee!) Lycus, crafty matron's side,
 Was done by curse, as Tyrinth's hero made
 That scullion dash on rock, his brains display'd,

So you will soon permit Salmasius' hand
 To seize thee, save he loathe thee as quite damn'd,
 A plague: then, with false gasconade,
 O Idler, thou might'st foil a strong tirade.
 What doom will great Saunsaie perform on thee,
 Infinitesimal Vacuity?
 Revenge in vain grasps what it cannot see.

Thou, dung-heap? Thou, Squash-head? Dost dare to gnaw
 At great Saunsaie and Monarchs' royal law?
 Now mouse plagues elephant, a frog the pard,
 On lion's mane a shrew-mouse climbs aboard,
 The monkey rides a bear, the gnat a kite,
 As roaches drip on Jove's pure birds of white
 And splash the God himself with chalky dew.

Why not, please Heaven, in Republic new,
 Wherein the sum of things to rascals comes,
 To sixpence scoundrels, unmix'd dregs o'rums
 Or what's impurer than the vilest blight
 Or blacker than their baleful Mother Night?
 Forgetting God and self, indeed these treat
 His crown as lowly footstool for their feet.
 And acting honor's farce the slaveys pray
 That Saturnalian sport forever stay.
 The King now slain by crime of size so grand,
 They as Princes do themselves command;
 The slain King's castles, purples, lands and gold
 They portion out among assassins bold
 As pay for murder done, and as they can,
 Seek solace for tormenting fellow man.

Just as the profane curs without a post
 Long to wet whatever dwarfs them most,
 These dungy rogues rejoice to violate Whatever's noble, good, immaculate,
 And twist great truths that bear no other blame
 Than having wealth or too much virtue's fame.

Here, Friends, does someone new to Britain say,
 "What care you of Darius', Daunus' sway,
 One man or mob?" Alone I check their stroke,
 Prepar'd to bow my neck to any yoke?

Reply: No yoke do I go to gainsay
 Lest I love's halier bond cast quite away,
 Or in my scale impiety approve.
 Not if supreme authorities he'd move,
 Did Paul teach people to afford their necks
 And so the great Apostle forbade axe
 And gibbet for the Parricides, and sacks,
 If any rascals to the highest peak
 By heinous parricide their way would seek.

Nor---whilst the holiest King stands without His doors, by traitors' horrid crime thrust out,
 And calls on Genius, Faith, the God of Laws--
 Ought he whose fibers good and justice thaws
 Withhold the exile from ancestral lands,
 That he indeed not gratify brigands,
 Those tyrants 'gainst whom all should clench their hands.

Yet I alone might bear all, save that God,
 Yea, God would "suffer threshing of that ped,"
 For crime which greater is than sin's estate
 Hides groaning world beneath its fearsome weight:
 These gory, cruel, foul, tyrannic facts
 And Charles' parricide--inhuman acts
 (That no Sun saw perform'd in days of yore
 And none will see for ages yet in store)--
 These impious deeds, these crimes are boldly done,

With show of sterner piety begun,
 (Alas !) on God as source and end they're laid,
 And Princes juicy sacrifices made,
 Crime's offering and murder's votive wish;
 This baneful juice of inky outtlafish,
 The Church's sore, Religion's poison dire
 Are longing for the triumph of Hell's fire,
 Alike the horror, shame of true Profession,
 Of heaven, earth the execration.

Yet there was found (Woe, God, to Thee !) a man,
 Or shade of one, in loathesome Stygian land,
 Who this immense disgrace thrown on the Lord,
 At which the World froze, all good men abhorr'd,
 And which the gazing Sun in puckers drew,
 Would shameless its defense consent to do:
 An obscure rabbler, pus and unmix'd bile,
 And sewer-filth steep'd soft in dark blood vile:
 A paltry clown; what fame he can't obtain
 By manly worth, through vice would seek to gain.

Fetch'd up 'gainst us from his Tartarean haunts,
 The scribbler counted hordes of sycophants,
 And plotted frauds, deceits a thousandfold,
 Both good and bad lump'd into falsehood bold,
 If anywise he might with curse dispraise
 The holy Martyr King, and at Saumaize

This mangy cur his feeble barks would raise.

Here, vile tormentor, words with you I need.
 Didst thou to such a hope poor father lead
 (Who stinted oft improvement of his parts),
 That you might shun the milk of kindly arts?
 Would not your fate have been a better still
 To move a plow, brave ass, or turn a mill,
 Or draw rude cart, mind turn'd to nothing ill?
 Then, harmless to the mother of the land,
 At least you could check blab with tighter band:
 Nor had you written to an evil end
 So you alone were he who might defend
 By art and reason's force his King's sad fate,
 Nor would the Parricides want Advocate:

For 'mongst those Zealots bestial even more Than utter beasts and fiercer than a boar,
 (With you remov'd) none other would there be
 Who could make show of some Latinity
 For Parricides and their enormity.
 Thence you wax haughty, rogue, and teach Saunaise
 To write his Latin now as peasant's brays
 Tell Letters' Prince---a pig, forsooth, does guide Athena, ill Thersites Nestor chide.

Can one have such a mental bankruptcy
 Or such a stupid dolt and blockhead be,

That he would haste to ruin self and fame,
 And to all of sound mind and learning's name
 Would freely own himself to be fair game?

But though you're unrestrain'd by gibes' disgrace,
 Things graver press; for wrath does gibe displace.
 Lest horrid crimes against God's deputies,
 So many wrongs, debauches, calumnies,
 Crimes heap'd on crimes pour down in cataracts
 A horror readers' minds now quite distracts,
 A wrathful heart, a tearful eye they form,
 Such hate they have for thee, O gallows' worm,
 That deadly madness borne by frothing cur
 Or serpents' poison black they would prefer,
 Or even ugly witch from Demon's den,
 Importing ruin to the shepherd's pen.

O were you due men's fear as much as curse,
 You'd be more dreaded through the Universe
 Than Hercules; and mothers with your name
 Would fright their young, tots quake at you the same
 As if Lycaon ate boys to his shame.

'Tis well as public foe in threats you're dire
 And worse than Sinon's guile, Busiris' ire,
 Excited more than tiger seeking lair
 And yet more cowardly than hasting hare,
 Scorn'd more than ape whose chatter people goads,

You're lesser than a louse, fouler than the toads,
 And even more defil'd than Houndsditch whore;
 Those empty, farting thundergusts you roar
 Nobody sets at tuppence--evil sign--
 Forebodings of a man's disorder'd mind,

Hence public wrath alone does daily grow
 To where, O Nameless, save you pack up and go,
 'Twill crush thee as a wolf, the curse of man,
 'Gainst whom the rustics, troop'd on every hand
 (Their hamlets left), with staves and rocks bring pain.
 Soon you'll be shunn'd as lightning-stricken fane.
 And like nam'd, if they taste of you enough,
 That ill-starr'd name with haste will soon swear off,
 Lest they, poor men, pay price of other's crime
 Or victims be of public wrath at any time.

O Thrice and four times wretched if you know--
 But still worse yet, if your thought be so slow
 You know not--how 'gainst People, God you've sinn'd,
 Or what the crimes on holy Truth you've pinn'd,
 How many ills you get your life and age,
 Whilst you, recruited to hir'd brigandage,
 Insanely offer now to risk instead
 Of these (Of all monstrosities most dread,
 And freely rushing on to doom)--your head.

What do you not drive mortal breasts to try,

O hateful lust for gain made on the sly?
 From this, indeed, O greedy rogue, you vex
 The greatest lords, whilst your mob reigns as Rex.

Up with thee, wretch! In season sow and glean,
 Fill up the barn whilst fortune is serene.
 At truth and good's expense bear thou thy fruit;
 Buy wealth at cost of shame as prostitute;
 And, as your heart has naught of reverence,
 So much the fatter be your purse with pence:
 Sell not your conscience for a paltry fee,
 But oh! whate'er you do, do rapidly.
 If stern of speech, may I the future show--
 King Charles is nigh (Ha! rogue, why tremble so?)
 And Virgin bearing liberator's sword
 And justice' scales, by tyranny abhorr'd.
 Thief, if you act, do what you're wont to try:
 Whate'er you can by ruses, fraud, and lie,
 Or what, thus brave in new audacity,
 You can by tricks of contriv'd piety,
 By tuneful trifles, smoothly turn'd deceit,
 If manhood is in you, with hands and feet,
 Quick, there! bend to redoubled efforts fleet.

Be more elusive than a potter's wheel,
 More bold than robber slitting purse with a steel,
 More vocal, lying than Agyrtes be,

Who fed snakes, and more vile than palmistry,
More base than Cromwell, worse than Ravillac.
And honor'd for these virtues, wretch, attack:
You Tyrants, you Ambassadors of crime,
With hurried consultations fill your time
(Woe, faith of God and man that parricide Dares send world embassies thus far and wide);
Go, flex your muscles, leave naught to essay,
But hurry it, for danger is delay.

This do, if any way you're given flight
From noose that chills your breast with fright
And in your gullet strangles guilty airs,
And way for food denies, and quite impairs
Your sleep, its image pricking up your hairs:

But recent victory perchance does find
Graz'd minds to rouse with hope's new wine.
Enough! Fates soon will find their known path,
Nor Heaven's slothful rod defer its wrath
From speeding rascals; Vengeance dogs the band
And proper laws for punishment still stand.

To bring thee to the block will satisfy;
I leave thee there. May happy destiny
Come to the Realm; I yield those candidates
To thee, grim block, and hand them to their fates.

THE END

NOTES

NOTES TO CHAPTER I

¹Eugène and Émile Haag, La France Protestante, V (1886), 807-808. The anagram is for his Latinized name of Petrus Molinaeus.

²The family pedigree, reproduced in Archaeologia Cantiana, IV, 34-35, places his death in 1615; but according to La France Prot., V, 799, it should be 1618.

³"La Vie de M. Pierre Du Moulin, Ministre de l'Eglise réformée de Sedan et professeur en Théologie, écrite par lui-même," Bulletin de la Société de l'histoire du Protestantisme français, VII (1858), 171.--Hereafter, Autobiography.

⁴Autobiography, p. 171.

⁵Autobiography, pp. 171-172.

⁶Autobiography, p. 172.

⁷Autobiography, pp. 172-173.

⁸The Dictionary of National Biography, ed. Sir Leslie Stephen and Sir Sidney Lee (Oxford, 1917), XIII, 1098.--Hereafter, DNB.

⁹Autobiography, p. 173.

¹⁰Ibid.

¹¹Ibid., pp. 173-174.

¹²La France Prot., V, 798; Autobiography, p. 174.

¹³Autobiography, p. 175.

¹⁴La France Prot., V, 801.

¹⁵Autobiography, pp. 175-176.

¹⁶Ibid., pp. 176-177.

¹⁷Ibid., p. 177.

¹⁸Ibid., pp. 178-179.

¹⁹Ibid.; La France Prot., V, 799; 800-801.

²⁰Autobiography, p. 178.

²¹Ibid., pp. 178-179; Pauli Fraheri Theatrum Virorum Eruditione Clarorum (Noribergae, 1688), Part I, Sect. III, p. 600.

²²Autobiography, p. 180; La France Prot., V, 801; DNE, XIII, 1098.

²³Autobiography, pp. 180-181; La France Prot., V, 801.

²⁴Autobiography, pp. 180-181.

²⁵Ibid.

²⁶Ibid.

²⁷Album Studiosorum Academiae Lugduno Batavae MDCLXXV-MDCCCLXXV Accedunt Nomina Curatorum et Professorum Per Eadem Secula (The Hague, 1855), p. 33; Autobiography, p. 181; La France Prot., V, 801.

²⁸Autobiography, pp. 181-182; La France Prot., V, 801; DNE, XIII, 1098.

²⁹Autobiography, p. 182; La France Prot., V, 801.

³⁰Autobiography, p. 182.

³¹Ibid., pp. 181-182.

³²Ibid.; La France Prot., V, 801.

³³The DNE account (XIII, 1098) mentions a visit in 1598; but this is evidently a second visit, for La France Prot., relying heavily on the Autobiography, states that a first visit was made in 1597, and that Du Moulin returned to Leyden before finally coming back to France (La France Prot., V, 801).

³⁴La France Prot., V, 801.

³⁵Joachim Du Moulin accepted the post at Jargeau after preaching in 1595 to a Protestant conclave at Orleans, following his stay of nearly twenty uncomfortable years at St. Pierre-Aigle. There his wife died in 1609. From a provincial synod at Jargeau on 25 June 1615, he obtained discharge from the ministry because of age and infirmity. See La France Prot., V, 798-800.

³⁶La France Prot., V, 801.

³⁷Ibid.

³⁸Though Du Moulin's Paris period and controversies will be treated later, these characteristics stand out. They can be seen in the titles of his many works. See Chapter II, Note 147.

³⁹La France Prot., V, 801-802.

⁴⁰La France Prot., V, 802n. The DNB is incorrect (XIII, 1098) in saying that Du Moulin was appointed to Charenton.

⁴¹La France Prot., V, 802.

⁴²DNB, XIII, 1098.

⁴³La France Prot., V, 802.

⁴⁴Mark Pattison vividly recounts the Cardinal Du Perron's adroit methods as a convertisseur in his persistent attempts to win Isaac Casaubon and his family to Catholicism. See Isaac Casaubon 1559-1614, 2nd. ed. (Oxford, 1892), esp. pp. 189-191, 213-216, 268-269, and 400-401. As a deft controversialist, it was Du Perron who was chosen to crush Philippe de Mornay at the conference of Fontainebleau in 1600, arranged by Henry IV after De Mornay published his attack on the Roman Catholic mass, De l'Institution, Usage et Doctrine du Saint Sacrement de l'Eucharistie en l'Eglise ancienne . . . ensemble comment, quand, et par quels Degrez La Messe s'introduit en sa Place . . . (La Rochelle, 1598). See Isaac Casaubon, pp. 136-145. Du Moulin was sent from Charenton to ask Casaubon not to attend the conference and thus play into the hands of De Mornay's opponents (Pattison, p. 139). Of Du Perron, Pattison remarks that "The part of chaplain man-of-the-world . . . has never been played with more success than by . . . Du Perron . . ." (p. 138). To the famous Casaubon, Du Perron adopted a tone of "learned unction" in religious discussion (p. 144). He "had learning," writes Pattison (p. 136), but with "the servile manners of a court chaplain . . ."

⁴⁵DNB, XIII, 1098. Du Moulin's fame increased as a result of his efforts to maintain Catherine de Bourbon in the Protestant faith despite conferences set up by convertisseurs to win her to Catholicism. See La France Prot., V, 802; Theatrum Virorum Eruditione Clarorum, Part I, Sect. III, p. 600.

⁴⁶Pattison states: "Fond of dispute and vain of his powers, he spent his life in discussion or controversies, or in writing attacks and answers. A man who maintained so much, and so dogmatically, was naturally obliged to be content sometimes with weak, sometimes with false, arguments. Casaubon, who had to hear his learned displays before his wondering and obedient flock at Charenton, could not help at times throwing out hints of the insufficiency of his glib references to the fathers, or regrets at the levity with which Christian antiquity was set aside" (Isaac Casaubon, pp. 220-221). Again: "Du Moulin, with no reading worth speaking of, had come triumphant out of many a dispute with catholic doctors. His favorite doctrine was, that scripture was so plain that it needed no interpreter but each man's common sense. If he looked into the writings of the fathers, it was not to use them--but to find expressions he could declaim against, as deviating from the standard of genevan orthodoxy" (Isaac Casaubon, pp. 403-404). Whatever Du Moulin's view of the fathers, inspection of his works shows he was not unlearned in them. If one can quarrel with his approach to them, the fault would seem to lie with the arbitrary spirit of the Calvinism he was defending.

⁴⁷Pattison, Isaac Casaubon, p. 221.

⁴⁸Casaubon, Ephemerides, ed. John Russell (Oxford, 1850), pp. 428, 523, 613, 668, and especially 671. The entries cover July, 1602; December, 1603; July, 1608; April, 1609; and May, 1609.

⁴⁹Casaubon, Ephemerides, p. 671.

⁵⁰Casaubon, Epistolae, ed. Theodore Janson, 3rd. ed. (Rotterdam, 1709), p. 350. Du Moulin's attitude toward the Fathers was cavalier. In seeking to show that Transubstantiation was unknown to the early Church (Ch. XX), Du Moulin writes: "Après vne si entiere deffaute de l'erreur: appeller les Peres pour les ouis là dessus, n'est point les appeller pour aides au cōbat, mais pour tesmoins de la victoire. Et ce que nous en produisōs des passages n'est pas pour nous defendre, mais pour les justifier Ils ont certes besoin de nostre aide pour maintenir leur honneur, mais nostre cause n'a point besoin de leur tesmoignage pour se defendre. Qui a pour foy la parole de Dieu ne mendie point les tesmoignages humains Car l'Euangile est aussi fort seul qu' ainsi accompagné, & mesmes estant defendu par autorités humaines, il pert de son autorité. Prouuer que Dieu a creé le monde, ou que Iesus-Christ est mort pour nous, pource qu' Irenée ou Hierosme l'ont dit, c'est appuyer nostre foy sur des festus & sous couleur de defendre la verité de Dieu l'inualider d'auantage."--Apologie pour la Sainte Cene du Seigneur (Geneve, 1610), pp. 184^v-185. Du Moulin's cocksure views of Scriptural interpretation and the Reformed religion are well expressed here: "Comme d'un point à vn autre la ligne la plus droite est la plus courte, aussi en la religion la verité tient tousiour le plus court chemin. Cela paroistra par la comparaison de la brièveté & clarté de nostre doctrine avec l'embarrasement & perplexité de celle de nos aduersaires."--Ibid., p. 18.

⁵¹Casaubon, Epistolae, p. 350. Casaubon wrote: "Nam constat mihi & certissimum est, doctrinam Calvini de Sacra Eucharistia longè aliam esse ab ea, quae in libro observandi Molinaei nostri continetur, & quae vulgò in Ecclesiis nostris auditur. Itaque Molinaeum qui oppugnant, Calvinum illi non minus obijciunt, quàm aliquem à veteribus Ecclesiae Doctoribus. Si sic pergimus, quis tandem erit exitus?" See also Ephemerides, p. 824.

⁵²Casaubon, Epistolae, p. 350. Casaubon thought Du Moulin, when confronted with the problems literalism raised in his eucharistic doctrine, was evasive: "Quum dicerem mihi hoc mirum videri," he writes, "et eam appellarem scaturiginem omnium haereseon, atque exempli caussa objicerem varias nostrorum de illis sententias, Hoc est corpus meum, ad suum librum de Eucharistia me rejecit, ubi ipse explicat ex hoc suo dogmate, sed mox a se discedit, et transit ad Calvinum, quem tamen ipsum non plane sequitur."--Ephemerides, p. 824. Calvin taught, in the Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 vols., tr. Henry Beveridge (Grand Rapids, 1957), Bk. IV, xvii, 10, 11, 19, 32, 33, that in the Eucharist the immortal, spiritual body and blood of Christ were present. Calvin maintained that the presence was spiritual and real, and that the believer feeds upon it by faith. Dismissing Transubstantiation and Consubstantiation, he likewise strongly rejected Protestant interpretations of (1) an empty symbolism, and (2) a notional presence (conceived only by the intellect and imagination).

⁵³Du Moulin specifically held that in the Communion there is a spiritual presence: "Car il y a diverses sortes de presence. Ce qui est present à la veuë n'est pas tousiours present à la main; & ce qui est present à l'ouye ne l'est pas à la veuë. Et ce qui est present au corps n'est pas tousiours present à l'esprit. Et les choses presentes à l'ame sont le plus souuët absentes du corps. Car les choses sont presentes selõ qu'elles se font sentir à nos sens ou à nos ames. Iesus-Christ donc nous est réellement present selon qu'il se fait sentir & se communique à nous. Or en ce Sacrement il se communique & se fait sentir à nos esprits & non à nos corps, il est donc present à nos esprits & nō à nos corps, & sa presence est spirituelle & non corporelle."--Apologie pour la Sainte Cene du Seigneur, pp. 17^{rdv}. "Mais ceste communion avec Iesus-Christ estant spirituelle, & le S. Esprit on estât le lien, il ne s'apprehēde point par la bouche, mais par la foy"--Ibid., p. 17. Du Moulin interpreted the Fathers to say "that as Christs divine nature hath united it selfe personally unto his humane nature, so the same divine nature, by vertue of the Consecration, is united to the bread of the Eucharist, by an union, though not personal and hypostaticall, yet mysticall, divine, and ineffable, by which the bread remaining bread, is made the body of Christ This opinion hath no foundation in the Scripture. Yet I dare say, it is an erreur no way prejudiciall to Christian Religion. For that opinion changeth not the nature of Christ, and destroyes not his humanitie To be short, it was an innocent error, serving to augment and encrease the peoples respect and reverence to the holie Sacrament, which for that cause they call terrible and wonderful."-- Anatomie of the Masse, tr. James Mountaine (London, 1641), pp. 212-213. Substantially the same view is expressed in Du Moulin's Buckler of the Faith, pp. 464-465, where he comments upon the Reformed doctrine of the Eucharist.

⁵⁴Casaubon, Ephemerides, p. 753 (entry for 25 July 1610).

Casaubon intensely felt the need for a middle course which would present the Christian Church and doctrine as it really had been--neither a Protestant construct (especially Calvinistic), nor a testimonial to the exclusive claims of Rome and the Papacy. This course, he thought, was especially needful against heresy. His protests about where Du Moulin's views might lead were futile. He wrote: "Pelagianismus sunt qui fugiunt, quum non animadvertant, se transire in partes Manichaeorum palam & manifesto. Fugiamus illa abrupta. Non solam moralis virtus; sed etiam vera pietas posita in medio. Qui deserunt, incidunt in Scyllam, cupientes vitare Charybdin. Ego ita comparatus sum, ut consensum primaevae Ecclesiae magni faciam; illis longe dissimilis, qui sceleratè Cyprianum Anabaptistam vocant; & dum petunt hodiernos Pontificios, veterem Ecclesiam feriunt."--Letter to Petrus Bertus, 30 September 1611, from London; Epistolae, p. 433. Du Moulin had also made the bad slip of calling Cyprian an Anabaptist in the Apologie pour la Sainte Gene: "Serons nous avec luy mesme & avec Iustin Chilliastes, avec Tertullian Montanistes, avec Cyprian Anabaptistes?" (p. 183). Casaubon goes on: "Postquam reverentia sublata est, quae debetur primis Ecclesiae Doctoribus, non potest evitari, quin novae subinde pullulent opiniones τερστώδεις Quoties audiivi concionatores, qui dicerent: Omnia pervia esse; omnia cuivis aperta; omnibus potentibus aspirare Spiritum Sanctum? Audiivi Parisiensem Ministrum [i.e., Du Moulin] centies defendentem hanc thesin: Sacram Scripturam nullà cujusdam interpretationis opus habere; quod etiam obiter significat in libro de Eucharistia. Quam objicerem periculum ei insanæ sententiæ conjunctum, nihil egi."--Epistolae, p. 433. Du Moulin, however, restricted his argument of Biblical sufficiency to points of salvation: "Qu'on ne nous die point la dessus que la Sainte Escripture est obscure & que plusieurs differens naissent sur son interpretation: Car toute l'Escripture n'est pas obscure; & les obscuritez mises à part ce qui reste de clair est suffisant à salut."--Apologie pour la Sainte Gene, p. 185^v. If one looks to the Fathers, Du Moulin asks, who can be saved? For who will arbitrate their disagreements?--Ibid., p. 188^v.

One of Du Moulin's baldest statements of Scriptural sufficiency--its self-explanatory capacity--is contained in A Learned Treatise of Traditions, Lately Set Forth in French by Peter Du Moulin, tr. G. C. (London, 1641), p. 19: "These two Questions, the one touching the authority of the Scripture, the other as concerning her perfection, are linked together inseparably. These two properties of Scripture reciprocally embrace one the other, and afford to themselves mutuall succour. For the Scripture it selfe by her authoritie maintaineth her sufficiency, and her sufficiency giveth her authoritie. And whosoever withstandeth the authoritie of the Scripture, fighteth also against her perfection: for if the Scripture be soveraigne Iudge, it is deficient in nothing to judge well." And the problem of understanding it? "An illiterate man not instructed in the knowledge of God, receiveth the testimony of the Church of his owne countrey, which telleth him that these books are canonicall, as a probable testimony, and which hee should not willingly contradict: but then hee beginneth to have of it a divine testimony, and of soveraigne efficacie, when the Spirit of God by the Doctrine contained in this Scripture, hath enlightened his spirit, and inflamed his heart with a secret vertue, whereof it is in vaine to dispute with those that feele it not: the which cannot serve for a law to another but serveth to every one of the faithfull in particular, to assure his conscience." (Ibid., p. 257).

Casaubon was justified in his fear that the doctrine of Scriptural self-sufficiency would dissolve Christian unity, as later happened in the multiplication of English Puritan sects, ably discussed by William Haller, Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution (New York, 1955), pp. 44-55; see also Basil Willey, The Seventeenth Century Background (London, 1934), pp. 57-75. The Protestant mythos, of which Casaubon was aware, was--as Haller well puts it--"the familiar story of the decline and fall from the pure dawn of the gospel, of the long night of corruption, ignorance, and superstition, of the reawakening of the true church at the Reformation, and of the present anticipation of new heaven and new earth" (pp. 50-51). Milton presents such an account in Of Reformation touching Church-Discipline in England: and the Causes that hitherto have hindred it (1641). Significantly, Milton's book and the English translation of Du Moulin's Treatise of Traditions appeared in the same year, and have suggestive likenesses. Especially interesting is their similarity in the point of Scriptural self-sufficiency vs. patristic obscurity. With Du Moulin's statements above, compare Milton (Of Reformation, in The Works of John Milton, ed. F. A. Patterson et al., 18 volumes (New York, 1931-38), III, 1, 32-33: ". . . it may chance to be objected, that there be many opinions in the Fathers which have no ground in Scripture; so much the lesse . . . should we follow them, for their own words shall condemn them, and acquit us, that lean not on them; otherwise these their words shall acquit them, and condemn us. But it will be reply'd, the Scriptures are difficult to be understood, and therefore require the explanation of the Fathers, 'tis true there be some Books, and especially some places in those Books that remain clouded; yet ever that which is most necessary to be known is most easie; and that which is most difficult, so farre expounds it selfe ever, as to tell how little it imports our saving knowledge The very essence of Truth is plainnesse, and brightness; the darknes and crookednesse is our own. The wisdom of God created understanding, fit and proportionable to Truth the object, and end of it, as the eye to the thing visible. If our understanding have a film of ignorance over it, or be blear with gasing on other false glisters, what is that to Truth? If we will but purge with sovrain eyesalve that intellectual ray which God hath planted in us, then we would beleeve the Scriptures protesting their own plainnes, and perspicuity"

⁵⁵Casaubon, Ephemerides, p. 753.

⁵⁶Ibid.

⁵⁷Ibid., p. 760.

⁵⁸The Defense will be discussed later in connection with Du Moulin's political controversies. La France Prot. (V, 809-810) lists the first edition at La Rochelle, 1604; others at Paris, 1612; rev. and augm., Geneva, 1624; English tr., London, 1610; Latin tr., London, 1614. The British Museum Catalogue (XIV, 102) lists a 1610 Paris ed., and an Amsterdam [?] ed. of 1612. The 1610 ed. may have been the one which gave Pattison (Isaac Casaubon, p. 404) the impression the book was first published in 1610.

⁵⁹Casaubon, Ephemerides, pp. 764-765.

⁶⁰As Casaubon tells it, Du Moulin appears already to have heard that Casaubon had criticized his views of the Fathers and had made notations in the Defense. See Ephemerides, pp. 764-765.

⁶¹Pattison (Isaac Casaubon, pp. 271-288) gives a detailed account of Casaubon's welcome to England and to the Church and Court circle. Besides the pension, he was to have a prebendal stall at Canterbury Cathedral valued at £88, plus provisions (Pattison, p. 272); his son Meric later became a prebendary of the cathedral. Pattison dates Isaac Casaubon's presentation in 1610; but see J. Dart, The History and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury . . . (London, 1727), p. 202, where Casaubon is listed as a canon in the Eighth Prebend, presented 16 January 1608. His invitation by James I and arrival, however, is noted as October, 1610.

⁶²Pattison, Isaac Casaubon, pp. 266, 269-270. Cf. p. 290.

⁶³Ibid., pp. 292-294, especially p. 293.

⁶⁴The full text of the letter (Latin) is given in Pauli Colomesii . . . Opera [incl. Selectae Clarorum Virorum Epistolae] (Hamburg, 1709), pp. 531-532. Pattison's cropped English translation is given in Isaac Casaubon, pp. 401-403. He discusses the affair on pp. 401-405, 220-222.

⁶⁵Pattison, Isaac Casaubon, p. 405.

⁶⁶Colomesii Opera, pp. 531-532; Pattison, pp. 401-402. I have primarily used the Latin original. Casaubon had lost a lawsuit brought by Geneva authorities over his wife's dowry, and felt deeply wronged (Colomesii Opera, p. 531). That this bulked large in his memory is shown by an entry in May, 1609, in the Ephemerides, that he wished to be reconciled to Geneva, forgive all, and listen to its pastors, "si modo illi potuerint adduci ut injuriam mihi factam agnoscant, et redire ipsi quoque in gratiam mecum velint" (p. 671).

⁶⁷Du Moulin's real concern about Casaubon's deviation from orthodoxy is completely dropped from Pattison's English version of the letter. Cf. Colomesii Opera, p. 532, and Pattison, p. 403. Pattison's distorted version deepens his unflattering portrait of Du Moulin.

⁶⁸Colomesii Opera, p. 532.

⁶⁹Casaubon's veneration for the Fathers was of course increased by his stay in England, and his aversion to their detractors—including Du Moulin—grew. See entries for March, 1611, in the Ephemerides, pp. 823-824. Casaubon dreads the effect upon private judgment of the doctrine that Scripture needs no interpreter, "sed omnia simpliciter, ut scripta sunt, esse accipienda" (Ephemerides, p. 824). Its results would be to disintegrate Christian unity and make its tenets unintelligible: "Sed nonne haec quoque nova sunt? Nonne hac ratione nuperi viam patefaciunt ad omnem haeresim? Aut dubitat hac opinione recepta religionem, quae nuper in tot capita est divisa, brevi in multo plura fore dividendam?" (Ephem., p. 825) For its consequences, see Note 54 supra. According to Casaubon, Du Moulin had often maintained the objectionable position in sermons, particularly about the Eucharist. When Casaubon protested the confusion likely to arise if the doctrine of literal acceptance is applied to difficulties in Scripture, Du Moulin waved away the niceties of theology as no concern of the simple: "Quid opus est idiotas sollicitos esse de vera interpretatione hujus loci?" (Ephem., p. 824) Casaubon's admiration for the Fathers was both nostalgic and pious: "Capior lectione Patrum; admiror pietatem; novitates non sapiunt palato meo" (from London, October, 1611)—Epistolae, p. 433.

⁷⁰With a glance at the infamous practice of informers in Imperial Rome, Pattison (p. 405) calls the letter a "secret delation" and (p. 403) lists Du Moulin among spiteful delators—thus darkening his sinister picture of Du Moulin.

NOTES TO CHAPTER II

¹C. H. McIlwain, ed., Introduction, The Political Works of James I (Cambridge, Mass., 1918), pp. 1-11. J. N. Figgis in The Divine Right of Kings (Cambridge, 1914), pp. 5-6, states the theory of Divine Right of Kings in its completest form in four propositions: (1) monarchy is a divinely ordained institution; (2) hereditary right is indefeasible; (3) kings are accountable to God alone; and (4) non-resistance and passive obedience are enjoined by God.

²The text of the Oath appears in Political Works of James I, pp. 73-74.

³McIlwain, Political Works of James I, pp. lxxii-lxxiii.

⁴On the grounds that earthly matters are subordinate to man's spiritual welfare, Bellarmine taught that the Pope had no direct temporal power over secular governments or rulers; but that by his spiritual and supreme Apostolic authority, he did have an indirect power, for a nation's spiritual welfare, to direct and correct political power, and at need to take it from one prince and confer it upon another. Bellarmine taught that the power of Kings is said to come from God because of Divine will that there should be among men a political power distinct from the Church; but that God does not give Kingly authority directly to specific rulers—it comes to them by the agreement and counsel of men, and can be changed the same way. Thus, in a better way God can work such changes and transfers through the Pope, his Vicar general over all. As pastor of the whole flock, the Pope must rule, direct, and correct everybody; as members of the flock, rulers are no exception to this. See Latin texts from Bellarmine's De Romano Pontifice, V, 1-viii, and Tractatus de Potestate Summi Pontificis (1610), cap. v, conveniently presented by McIlwain, Political Works of James I, pp. xxii-xxiii. In his treatise De Laicis, Ch. VI, Bellarmine held that, since man must be governed by someone for his survival, political power comes from the law of nature, which he identifies with the law of God. But political power is in all the people, and divine right gives it to no individual; the power can be transferred to one or many. Moreover, governmental forms—monarchy, aristocracy, democracy—depend on the law of nations, not of nature, for the form depends on the people's consent; and they can change their form of government. Bellarmine favors elective kingdoms. See illustrative excerpts from De Laicis presented by John C. Rager in Political Philosophy of Blessed Cardinal Bellarmine (Washington, 1926), pp. 49, 52, 53. See discussions of Bellarmine by J. N. Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius 1414-1625 (Cambridge, 1956), pp. 158-159; and J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1957), pp. 357-360. Of the doctrine of tyrannicide, Figgis (Gerson to Grotius, pp. 146-147) agrees with Lossen that the Jesuits should not be entirely identified with Mariana's teachings.

As Figgis (p. 147) and Allen (Political Thought, pp. 360-361) point out, Mariana differs significantly from other Jesuit writers. In part, his De Rege et Regis Institutione (Toledo, 1599) is a tutorial manual for princes; it is also a philosophical treatise on the origin and nature of the state, and a study of the Spanish constitution. It grounds a theory of political authority on a concept of the state of Nature which foreshadows Rousseau and Locke. On this point, cf. G. K. Tallmadge, "Juan Mariana," Jesuit Thinkers of the Renaissance, ed. Gerard Smith, S.J. (Washington, 1939), pp. 175-176. Mariana asserted a popular origin of power, arguing whether "Reipublicae an Regis maior potestas sit": "ne tamen auctore, quando Regia potestas, si legitima est, à ciuibus ortum habet, ijs concedentibus primi Reges in quaque republica in rerum fastigio collocati sunt: eam [potestatem] legibus & sanctionibus circumscribent ne sese nimia afferat, luxuriet in subditorum perniciem, degeneretque in tyrannidem."--De Rege (1599), I, viii, 88. The King is not free from the law; on the contrary, ". . . sit Principi persuasum, leges sacrosantas, quibus publica salus stat, tum dum fore stabiles, si suo ipse eas exemplo sanciat Cum enim fas iusque legibus contineatur in omni vitae parte, qui leges violat ab aequitate discedat, & à probitate necesse est. quod nulli conceditur, Regi multo minus" At need, the Prince may pass, interpret, or soften the laws, but to pervert them to self-interest is tyranny (De Rege, I, ix, 101). What is a tyrant? "Tyrannus est enim qui imperat inuitis, qui armis reipublicae libertatem opprimit, qui non populi vtilitati praecipue seruit, sed suum emolumentum & arrepti imperij amplificationem respicit" (De Rege, I, ix, 104).

The book gained notoriety from its doctrine of tyrannicide, but despite the sensational interpretations given it, Mariana's program for dealing with tyrants was not irresponsible. Warning that, to avoid civil disturbance, Princes should not easily be resisted, he outlined a system for dealing with tyrants. If by spoliation, contempt for laws and holy religion, vicious life, pride, and impiety, he is ruining the commonwealth, the Prince should be compelled to abdicate, preferably by a public, deliberative assembly. He should be admonished, and if he refuses to amend, be deprived of his power by public sentence. Because war will break out, the assembly must raise arms and public support. If the commonwealth cannot be defended otherwise, he should be executed as a declared public enemy. The citizen has the same power of execution. If there can be no assembly, if the country is falling and the tyrant brings public enemies into a province, anyone may justly kill him. "Ita facti quaestio in controuersia est," Mariana admits, "quis merito tyrannus habeatur; iuris in aperto, fas fore tyrannum perimere. Neque est periculum," he adds hopefully, "vt multi eo exemplo in Principum vitam saeuia quasi tyranni sint. Neque enim id in cuiusquam privati arbitrio ponimus: non in multorum, nisi publica vox populi adsit, viri eruditi & graves in consilium adhibeantur Quod caput est, sit Principi persuasum totius reipublicae maiorem, quam ipsius unius auctoritatem esse: neque possidis hominibus credat diversum affirmantibus gratificandi studio: quae magna perniciēs est."

 --De Rege, I, vi, 75-78. Mariana favored tyrannicide by secretly administered poison. Not only would there be greater chance of success, but to force a tyrant to take his life by dagger or poison would be to incur the guilt of suicide (De Rege, I, vii, 83-85). See further Allen, Political History, pp. 363-366; Figgis, Gerson to Grotius, pp. 149-156. The relationship between Mariana's doctrine of dethroning tyrants and the later trial of Charles I, especially in the Puritan party line, is obvious. See the discussion of delegated power, tyrants, deposition, and tyrannicide in Milton's Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), ed. William Haller (New York, 1932), pp. 7-23 ff., 40-41, 54-59. Cf. Chapter V, n. 6.

⁵The 1599 edition of De Rege (here quoted) praised Jacques Clement, assassin of Henry III, as "the eternal glory of France"; as a result, Aquaviva, General of the Jesuit order, had the passage expurgated in the second edition (1603). After the assassination of Henry IV, "le tyran de Béarn," the book was burnt (1610) by the hangman; and in 1611 Aquaviva forbade the teaching of tyrannicide. See Tallmadge, Op. Cit., pp. 161-164, 185-191.

⁶McIlwain, Political Works of James I, pp. lvi-lix; Pattison, Isaac Casaubon, pp. 310-312.

⁷McIlwain, Political Works, p. lxi, Note.

⁸Ibid., pp. xlix-lxi.

⁹Ibid., pp. lxi-lxii.

¹⁰Ibid., pp. lxi-lx.

¹¹Ibid., p. lxi.

¹²Ibid. McIlwain gives the Jacobean translation of the Papal Breves on pp. 73-75, 80-81, and of Bellarmine's letter to Blackwell on pp. 82-85.

¹³Ibid., pp. lx-lxi.

¹⁴Ibid.

¹⁵Ibid., p. lxi.

¹⁶Ibid., pp. 122-128.

¹⁷Ibid., pp. 160-166.

¹⁸Ibid., pp. 166-168.

¹⁹Ibid., p. lxx.

²⁰For a detailed account, see McIlwain, Ibid., pp. lxxi-lxxv.

²¹Ibid., p. lxx.

²²Ibid., p. lxx.

²³"I freely indeede confesse," writes Du Moulin, "that in an Elective kingdoms, when question is made of choosing a new king, they to whom that charge belongeth, ought in no wise to chuse a king that is an Infidell or an Idolater. But it is one thing to speake of a king who is chosen by his subjects; and another, of a king who is a lawfull inheritour, and who is beholding to his birth for his Crowne, and to whom ouer and above, his subjects haue taken the Oath of Allegiance. And therefore the Argument which Bellarmino draweth from the one to the other, to proue that Subjects are at no hand to endure a king that is an Heretick or an Infidel, doth not follow vpon good consequence."--Defence of the Catholicke Faith (London, 1610), pp. 68-69. Of Bellarmino's theory of the Pope's indirect power to depose, Du Moulin observes that "Such like a May-game do we find in Bellarmino, and in all their late Diuines, who willing to cloake their foule fact, haue inuented new termes to expresse the same thing."--Defense, p. 61. And, with an eye to the Huguenots: ". . . indeede euen in humane pollicy, and without any relation to the commandements of God, it is not expedient that subjects should shake off the yoke of their Prince which is of a different religion" (p. 69).

²⁴Chapter VII (pp. 105-128) is a list of examples from English and European history to substantiate the chapter heading, which I have summarized in the text above.

²⁵In his later treatise Buckler of the Faith, 2nd, English ed. (London, 1623), Du Moulin wrote: "We on the contrary maintaine, that obedience due to Kings and Magistrates proceedeth from the diuine Law, & is grounded vpon the ordinance of God. To that end all the places of Scripture set down do serue, to show that God commandeth obedience to Kings and Soueraigne powers, as to those whom he both established, whom no man may resist without resisting God," (p. 557). Writing later, he further declared: "L'obeyssance aux Souverains est vne chose juste & necessaire. Trouver en sa religion, ou en celle de son Roy, occasion de rebellion, c'est à faire à des brouillons qui defendent la religion par des voyes condamnées par ceste mesme religion, qui estans incommodés en leurs affaires particulieres, esperent trouver guerison par le mouvement de la Piscine, & se sauuer parmy confusion. Iamais la cause de Dieu ne s'avance par là Je suis de ceste opinion, qu'és choses civiles il est plus expedient à vn peuple d'avoir vn mauvais Maistre que de n'en avoir point du tout Mais où il n'y va que de la perte des biens & de la vie, vaut mieux subir ce joug injuste que pour s'en exempter troubler la paix publique par vne rebellion contre son Souverain. Car la force des loix humaines ne gist pas en ce qu'elles sont justes, mais en ce qu'elles sont loix, & faictes par celuy qui a autorité. Combien qu'elles ayent quelque chose d'injuste, si est ce qu'il est juste de leur obeyr Ceste paix & prosperité se trouvera tousiours plus ferme & durable en la Monarchie, qu'en toute autre forme d'estat: Car c'est le seul gouvernement civil, qui imite le gouvernement du monde vniversel, où il n'y a qu'un maistre, & tous les autres Estats quand ils sont fort accreus, y reviennent par necessité Bref j'ose dire, que la principale cause de la haine qu'on nous porte, est parce que nous defendons par la parole de Dieu les droicts de nos Roys, contre les vsurpations des Papes"—Lettres Des Sieurs du Moulin & de Balsac (La Haye, 1633), pp. [9-10.]

²⁶Du Moulin's position here is consistent with his other statements on the Eucharist. See Note 53 to Chapter II.

²⁷Meiliwain, Political Works of James I, p. lxi.

²⁸Ibid., p. lxii.

²⁹Ibid., p. lxii.

³⁰Ibid., pp. lxii-lxv.

³¹Ibid., p. lxiv.

³²De Monarchia Temporalis Pontificis Liber, Quo Imperatoris, Regum, & Principum iura aduersus vsurpationes Papae defenduntur: Et docetur quibus artibus Papa ab humili statu ad tantae potentiae culmen ascenderit (London, 1614).

³³De Monarchia, Sigs. *2^v-*4.

³⁴Ibid., pp. 52-67.

³⁵Ibid., pp. 68-76, 76-87.

³⁶Ibid., p. 87.

³⁷Ibid., pp. 87-88.

³⁸Ibid., p. 89.

³⁹Ibid.

⁴⁰Ibid., p. 90.

⁴¹Ibid., p. 93.

⁴²Ibid., p. 98.

⁴³Ibid., pp. 100-197; 197-262.

⁴⁴Ibid., pp. 262-335.

⁴⁵Harangue Faicte de la Part de la Chambre Ecclesiastique, en celle du tiers Estat, sur l'Article du Serment. Par Monseigneur le Cardinal du Perron, Archevesque de Sens, Primat des Gaules & de Germanie, & Grand Aumosnier de France. A Paris, Par Antoine Estienne, Imprimeur du Roy . . . M. DC. XV. Avec priuilege de sa Majesté, & permission de l'Auteur. I have examined the copy in The Newberry Library, Chicago, but for convenience refer to excerpts given by McIlwain, Op. Cit., p. lxvii.

⁴⁶McIlwain, Political Works of James I, p. lxvii.

⁴⁷Ibid.

⁴⁸Ibid., pp. lxviii-lxix.

⁴⁹Ibid., p. lxix.

⁵⁰Ibid. For a fuller account, see Henry M. Baird, The Huguenots and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, 2 vols. (New York, 1895), I, 91-99.

⁵¹McIlwain, Political Works, p. lxxx. McIlwain gives the text of the English translation, pp. 159-268.

⁵²Ibid., p. lxx.

⁵³Nouveauté du Papisme, Dedication, Sig. *11j.

⁵⁴Nouveauté du Papisme, Preface, Sig. v1^v.

⁵⁵Ibid., Sigs. 11^{r&v}.

⁵⁶Ibid., Sigs. 1^{r&v}.

⁵⁷Ibid., pp. 1-247.

⁵⁸Ibid., pp. 249-287.

⁵⁹See especially Bk. VII, pp. 375-488.

⁶⁰Ibid., Preface, Sigs. [v^rrv].

⁶¹Ibid., Sig. [v].

⁶²Ibid., Sigs. 11j^v-[1v^v].

⁶³Ibid., Sig. [v^v].

⁶⁴Tout ce tourment que se donne ce Cardinal prouient de ne vouloir s'arrester à L'Escripture sainte, & de chercher d'autres iuges que la parole de Dieu, enueloppant par ce moyen les esprits en vn labyrinthe sans issue. Car les escrits des Peres sont livres Grecs & Latins & d'une lōgueur & multitude infinie, & dont le peuple ne peut auoir aucune cognoissance Et on dispute du sens des passages des Peres autant ou plus que du sens de l'Escripture sainte. En laquelle contestation si l'Eglise Romaine est iuge du sens des Peres, sans doute elle gagnera son procès. Et les Peres à tout propos se discordent entre eux. Et on ne nous dit point qui sont ceux ausquels il faut plustost croire, ni combien il faut de Peres pour etabliir vn article de foy."--Ibid., Preface, Sig. 11j^v.

⁶⁵Ibid., Sig. 9-[27111].

⁶⁶Ibid., Sigs. bi1j^v-[b 1v^v].

⁶⁷Ibid., Sigs. b-b1j.

⁶⁸Pattison, Isaac Casaubon, pp. 136-145.

⁶⁹Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 82.

⁷⁰Ibid., pp. 82-83.

⁷¹La France Prot., V, 803; DNB, XIII, 1098. The DNB speculates that Du Moulin was brought over, upon recommendation of Sir Theodore Mayerne, to help James with his Regis Declaratio pro Jure Regio.

⁷²La France Prot., V, 803.

⁷³Ibid.

⁷⁴Baird, Op. Cit., I, 81-82, 176-177; La France Prot., V, 811-

75 Baird, Op. Cit., I, 81-82; La France Prot., V, 811-812.

76 La France Prot., V, 811.

77 See La France Prot., V, 811-812 for details.

78 Ibid.

79 La France Prot., V, 812. There was a Geneva edition in 1625, and an Oxford edition of 1620 bound with a sermon Du Moulin gave before King James at Greenwich.

80 La France Prot., V, 812-813 provides a list.

81 La France Prot., V, 812.

82 Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 162.

83 Ibid., pp. 162-163.

84 De la Vocation des Pasteurs, Dedication, Sigs. a[6]^v-a[8]. Cf. Buckler of the Faith, p. 360. La France Prot., V, 813, lists two editions at Sedan in 1618: 1st ed., J. Jamon; rev. ed., Pacard; Geneva editions of 1631 and 1672; and a German translation, Frankfurt, 1619. Baird (Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 82n) says that years later Fenelon thought it deserved refutation.

85 Du Moulin's line of attack is that "examinans à la parole de Dieu les charges de Pape & de Cardinal, d'Euesque & de prestre, nous trouuons la charge de Pape & de Cardinal estre vne pure vsurpation, & inuention humaine: & les charges de Prestre & d'Euesque de l'Eglise Romaine estre entierement corrompues & destournées de leur vray vsage, dont les maux qui en naissent sont si grands, que par ce moyen le Royaume spirituel de Jesus Christ est changé en vne Monarchie temporelle, & vn autre sacrifice; bref, vne autre Religion introduite que celle qui se trouue en l'Ecriture sainte."--Vocation des Pasteurs, p. 68. Moreover, "L'Empire Romain Papal est vne Monarchie temporelle sous ombre de gouvernement spirituel, laquelle ayant succédé à d'Ancien Empire Romain, & estant bastie de ses ruines, aussi le contrefait elle, & imite tout ce que cét Empire a eu de plus splendide, & de plus apparent." (pp. 84-85). "Tout Euesque est Prestre, & Sacrificateur du corps de Christ, & l'Eglise Romaine n'en fait qu'vn mesme ordre. Et par consequence les mesmes raisons qui ont esté apportees contre l'ordre de Prestrise, seruent aussi contre l'Episcopat Romain. Mais l'Episcopat à cecy de plus, que d'vne charge spirituelle, elle est deuenue vne dignité temporelle, dependante nuëment du Pape, & vne espee de primauté de l'Empire Papal." (p. 100) Cf. p. 183.

⁸⁶Furthermore, in attacking avarice as the reason the Roman clergy "corrupted doctrine" for riches, Du Moulin reminds one of the charges English Puritans were currently making against the Established Church: "Il n'y a rien qui ruine d'avantage la religion que l'avarice. Par ceste porte sont entrez les vices en l'Eglise, & par les vices les erreurs. La corruption des mœurs a corrompu la doctrine C'est ce vice qui courbe la reigle de la vraye doctrine pour l'accorder au guain de peu de Prelats qui viennent de l'ausuglement public, auxquels la deuotion ignorante de peuple est tributaire. Combien cela desplaist au fils de Dieu, appert par le remuerement des tables des changeurs qu'il fit au temple, reprochant aux Sacrificateurs que d'une maison d'oraison ils auoient fait vne cauerne de brigans."--Vocation des Pasteurs, pp. 161-162.

⁸⁷Ibid., pp. 14-15.

⁸⁸Ibid., p. 17.

⁸⁹Ibid., pp. 29-30.

⁹⁰Ibid., pp. 41-42. Cf. p. 46.

⁹¹Ibid., p. 44.

⁹²Ibid., p. 49.

⁹³See Chapter III, Note 36.

⁹⁴The correspondence was originally printed as Reverendi In Christo Patris Lanceloti Episcopi Wintonensis Ad Petri Molinaei Epistolae tres, Una cum Molinaei Epistolis. Londini, Excudebat Felix Kyngston . . . 1629. It is reprinted in Andrewes' Opuscula Quaedam Posthuma, ed. J. H. Parker, (Oxford, 1852). Two of the letters--Andrewes' in partial form--are found in Colomesii Opera, pp. 514-517.

⁹⁵In his first letter to Andrewes, Du Moulin restated it thus: ". . . non esse juris divini, nec caput fidei, sed rem esse circa quam vetus Ecclesia usa sit sua libertate et prudentia, judicans praeeminentiam unius esse accommodatorem ordini tuendo et paci conservandae: et posse inter Ecclesias super hac re discrepantes partem esse integramque concordiam."--Andrewes' Opuscula, p. 176.

⁹⁶Ibid.

⁹⁷Ibid., pp. 176-177.

⁹⁸Vocation des Pasteurs, p. 16: "Du temps de nos peres, quand Dieu du milieu de la Papauté s'est suscité des serviteurs qui descourissent les abus de l'Eglise Romaine; es lieux où il a employé les Euesques de l'Eglise Romaine à ceste oeuvre excellente, comme en Angleterre, le nom & le degré d'Euesque est demeuré."

⁹⁹Andrewes, Opuscula quaedam, p. 177.

¹⁰⁰Andrewes wrote: "Neque hic, tam, quid dixeris, respicit Rex, quam quorsum: quam quid inde arrepturi, qui alibi, qui apud nos hic, iniquiores sunt in hunc ordinem: perinde scilicet ista dici, quasi et res quoque. Quorsum enim hoc, aut quid attinet, in distinctione rerum, de confusione vocum verba facere? Nomen fere non vellicet, nisi qui rei ipsi non omnino bebe vult."—Ibid., p. 180.

¹⁰¹Ibid., p. 182. Andrewes reflects a growing Anglican insistence on Episcopacy. Norman Sykes gives an excellent account of this trend in Old Priest and New Presbyter (Cambridge, 1957), pp. 58-117. Whereas the Elizabethan divines were frequently diffident toward presbyterian politics, in the face of insistent Presbyterian Scriptural claims ". . . it was not sufficient to appeal to the royal supremacy, and to rest episcopacy upon the will of the godly prince" (p. 60); "this new emphasis upon episcopacy was the result of the dual attack upon the church of England by Romanist and presbyterian opponents," but "the Anglican asserters of episcopacy generally stopped short of unchurching the foreign reformed churches and of denying the validity of their ministry and sacraments" (p. 69). Thus, Episcopacy ". . . was held to be not of dominical but of apostolic appointment, and as divino jure only in that sense; as necessary where it could be had, but its absence where historical necessity compelled did not deprive a church of valid ministry and sacraments. It was necessary to the perfection or integrity of a church, though not its essence" (p. 81). The Andrewes-Du Moulin correspondence is discussed, pp. 73-75. It was with the Act of Uniformity of 1662 that the community with the Reformed ministry was broken (pp. 116-117).

¹⁰²Andrewes, Opuscula quaedam, p. 187.

¹⁰³Ibid., pp. 187-188.

¹⁰⁴Ibid., pp. 193-201.

¹⁰⁵Ibid., pp. 202-216.

¹⁰⁶The full title was Bouclier de la Foy, ou Defense de la Confession de Foy des Eglises Reformees du Royaume de France. Contre les Objections du S^r. Arnoux Iesuite. Liure auquel sont decidees toutes les principales controuerses entre les Eglises Reformees, & l'Eglise Romaine. Par Pierre du Moulin . . . (Charenton: Abraham Pacard, 1618). Of the many French editions of this popular work, a second appeared at Charenton in 1619, others at Sedan (1622), Geneva (1630, 1635), Paris (1846); German translations appeared at Cleves (1620), Bremen (1627), Basle (1628). English translations appeared at London in 1620, 2nd. English edition (1623), 3rd. edition, 1631. I have cited the 2nd. English edition, and examined the 1619 Charenton edition.

107 Differences between the English and early French editions are explained above.

108 Buckler of the Faith, Sig. 91v.

109 Ibid., p. 344.

110 Ibid.

111 Ibid., p. 345.

112 Ibid., "I know that vnder the pretence that the Church of England hath another forme of discipline then ours is, our aduersaries charge vs that our religion is diuerse. But experience confuteth this accusation; for we assemble with the English men in their Churches, we participate together in the hely Supper of our Lord; the doctrine of their Confession is wholly agreeable vnto ours. England hath bene a refuge for our persecuted Churches, who, notwithstanding the difference of Ecclesiasticall policie, haue not receiued lesse entertainment." --Buckler, p. 345.

113 Ibid., pp. 347-348. Du Moulin seeks to show the good faith of this statement by observing that "in England, where God hath vsed Bishops to striue against and to resist Papistry, and where God hath giuen them soueraigne Princes, which maintained and vpheld them by their power, Episcopall order continueth, and flourisheth at this day. And God hath here raised vp and still doth, excellent Bishops, both for learning and pietie, which courageously maintaine Gods cause, both by word of mouthe and writing; and some of them also haue receiued the crowne of martyrdome for the confession of the Gospell." --Buckler, p. 347.

114 "And euen as equalitie is receiued among vs to shunne ambition and tyrannie, so England hath reiected this equalitie, to auoyd confusion and contempt of the Ministrie. They [Anglican theologians] say, and that with good reason, that no societie, no familie nor common-wealth, can prosper without some degrees of superioritie; and that it is so among the Angels, and in the gouernment of the vniuersall world." --Buckler, p. 347. Cf. Lettres Des Sieurs du Moulin & de Balsac, quoted in Note 25.

115 The title page sets out the purpose: A Letter of a French Protestant to a Scottishman of the Covenant. VWherein one of their chiefe pretences is removed, which is their conformitie with the French Churches in points of Discipline and Obedience. London, Printed by R. Young, and R. Badger. 1640.

116 See Note 114. Dr. Peter Du Moulin gives the passage in full, Letter of A French Protestant, pp. 17-18.

117 Letter of a French Protestant, pp. 16-18.

118 For a full treatment, see H. M. Baird, Op. Cit., I, 127-158.

119 For text of the oath and account of the Synod's proceedings, see La France Prot., V, 803-806.

120 Dr. Peter Du Moulin, in A Vindication of the Sincerity of the Protestant Religion in the Point of Obedience to Sovereigns, 4th ed. (London, 1679), records that "my Reverend Father especially, who being eminent and respected in the party, was a principal means to keep the Protestant Churches on this side Loire in peace and duty to their King, for which his Majesty sent him a considerable sum of money, which he refused to take, saying, that he would be loyal to his King without being bought."--p. 37.

121 Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 159.

122 Ibid., p. 158. The delegates were Du Moulin, Chamier, Chauve, and Rivet. See John Quick, Synodicon in Gallia Reformata: Or, the Acts, Decisions, and Canons of those Famous National Councils of the Reformed Churches in France (London, 1692), p. 14.

123 La France Prot., V, 813-814.

124 Ibid., pp. 803-804.

125 Ibid. With a grim piety, the Synod of Alais, after a violent condemnation of Arminius' doctrines, made the Dort canons binding upon all pastors, and their acceptance a prerequisite for any employment in churches or universities; and ordered that ministers not pry into God's secret mysteries, "and that they would so order their discourses and sermons concerning Predestination, that it may promote Repentance and Amendment of Life, console all wounded Consciences, and excite the practice of Godliness; that by this means all occasions of Disputes and Controversies may be avoided, and we may abide united in one and the same Faith with our Brethren of the Netherlands, and other Churches of our Lord Jesus without the Kingdom . . ." (Quick, Synodicon, p. 38). Then comes the Oath taken in the National Synod and administered to all members of the Provincial Synods. The Canons of Dort are said to agree perfectly with the Word of God, and the swearer promises never to deviate from their dogma. The Oath continues: "I declare also and I protest that I reject and condemn the Doctrine of the Arminians, because it makes Gods Decree of Election to depend upon the mutable Will of Man, and for that it doth extenuate and make null and void the grace of God; it exalteth Man, and the powers of Free Will to his destruction, it reduceth into the Church of God old, ejected Pelagianisme, and is a Mask and Vizard for Popery to creep in among us under that disguise, and subverteth all Assurance of Everlasting Life and Happiness." (Ibid., pp. 38-39) Du Moulin's signature as moderator is first on the list. Adopted at Alais, the Canons of Dort were incorporated by the French Reformed Church, printed by the Synod of Charenton (1623), and made binding on all churches and universities. (Ibid., pp. 126-152) Having fled France (v. infra), Du Moulin was not at this Synod. Apart from its theological rigor, one can see the Synod of Alais motivated by a wish for the strongest possible Protestant bonds of doctrine, and a fear of infection by Papistry. Its action reflects the even grimmer Synod of Dort, as a result of which Oldenbarnevelt was executed and Hugo Grotius, Du Moulin's former student, imprisoned. In Holland, the Arminians reacted against severe Calvinism; a similar movement was going on in England, especially at Cambridge, and Andrewes was associated with it. See W. H. Frere, The English Church in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I (1558-1625) (London, 1924), pp. 343-345. The Dutch Arminians favored more freedom than the severe Dutch Reformed Calvinists; and in their reaction against Calvinistic theocracy, for self-protection developed political theory whereby the instrument of power should be placed in the civil magistrate, not the clergy. For an excellent discussion of Anglo-Dutch Arminianism, see Rosalie L. Collie, Light and Enlightenment: A Study of the Cambridge Platonists and the Dutch Arminians (Cambridge, 1957), pp. 7-21.

126 Pierre Du Moulin, The Anatomie of Arminianisme: Or, The Opening of the Controversies of these times (formerly handled in the Low-Countries) concerning the Doctrine of Providence, of Predestination, of the Death of Christ, of Nature and Grace, &c. . . . (London, 1635), Sigs. A3^v-A4.

127 Ibid., Sig. A4^v.

128 Ibid., Sig. A[6]^v.

129 Ibid., Sig. A[7].

130 Ibid., p. 409.

131 Dr. Peter Du Moulin provides an English translation of the letter in his Vindication of the Sincerity of the Protestant Religion, 1st ed. (1664), pp. 38-44; 4th ed. (1679), pp. 38-44. He also alludes to his father's letter in Letter of a French Protestant, pp. 46-47, after first pointing out that in 1615 and 1616 the persuasions of the elder Du Moulin kept "all the Churches on this side Loire . . . in the Kings obedience; for which the Queens Regent gave him thanks." (p. 146)

132 Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 188-191.

133 Ibid., pp. 190-192.

134 Ibid., pp. 157, 192, 268.

135 Ibid., pp. 201-202.

136 DNB, XIII, 1098; La France Prot., V, 806. According to Quick, Du Moulin wrote the letter to King James "... (who had a value and kindness for this Learned Minister) in which he informed His Majesty, how that not only the Eyes of all the Reformed Churches of France were upon him for help in this the day of their Exigency and great distress, but the Eyes also of all other the Reformed and Protestant Churches in Europe." (Synodicon, p. 105) The letter came to the King, but fell into Buckingham's hands, who sent the original to Louis XIII. When Louis issued warrants for Du Moulin's arrest, they were executed so slowly he was warned and able to escape (Ibid.). William Bates, Vitae Selectorum Aliquot Virorum (London, 1681), says that the royal council hoped Du Moulin would incriminate himself by going to Rochelle from Alais; instead, he went to Lyons, where a letter from Drélincourt at Charenton warned him. Thence he returned to Paris by night, took Lord Herbert's advice, and fled to Sedan.

137 DNB, XIII, 1098-99; La France Prot., V, 806. Opening 1 September 1623, the Synod of Charenton sent deputies to Louis XIII to ask that Du Moulin be allowed to return to the kingdom and resume his duties at Charenton. The King personally refused them. (Quick, Synodicon, p. 104).

138 Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I, 1623-25, p. 94.

139 Minute from Comsay's Letter Book, p. 149, given in Cal. State Papers, Dom., James I, 1623-25, p. 333.

140 Ibid., pp. 332, 337; 373; 385.

141 Ibid., p. 394.

142 Ibid., p. 444.

143 DNB, XIII, 1099; La France Prot., V, 807.

144 Ibid.

145 La France Prot., V, 807.

146 DNB, XIII, 1099; La France Prot., V, 807.

147 There is no one complete bibliography of Du Moulin's works. However, the most satisfactory listing of them, chronological and sometimes annotated, is in La France Prot., V, 808-823. There is a less accessible account in Quick's Synodicon, pp. 105-107. For a fuller account of editions and translations, these must be amplified with the British Museum Catalogue, XIV, 99-106; and Bibliothèque Nationale Catalogue, XLIV, 604-633.

148 Cal. State Papers, Dom., Charles I, 1629-31, p. 310.

149 Ibid., p. 314.

150 Marquardi Gudii et Doctorum Virorum ad Eum Epistolae . . . Et Claudii Sarravii Senatoris Parisiensis Epistolae Ex eadem Bibliotheca auctiores. Curante Petro Burmanno. (Utrecht, 1697), p. 33.

151 He writes: "Interea nos exercibimus cum veterano Molinaeo, quem tamen omnem militiam ejurare oportuisset . . . Huic vero genua labant, nec potest vel levissime impulsus, in vestigio consistere. Vidistin' quos consarcinavit Articulos fidei, ut loqui amat, Amyraldianae? Nihil levius, futilius, falsius, aut calumniosius unquam a quoquam exaratum est. Et tamen in isto mustaceo lauream quaerit, vir sui amantissimus, cui foetidum sum stercus bene olet. Nactenus ejus aetati & pristinis in Ecclesiam meritis, est parcitum: verendum est tamen ne patientia laesa fiat furor."—Sarrau, Epistolae, p. 207. Yet he had called Du Moulin "bonus ille Senex" in a letter to Salmasius in Leyden, dated 11 December 1648 at Paris (Epistolae, p. 195).

152 William Bates, Vitae, p. 718.

153 Ibid.

154 Ibid.

NOTES TO CHAPTER III

¹DNB, XIII, 1097; La France Prot., V, 824.

²La France Prot., V, 824.

³Ibid.

⁴Ibid.

⁵DNB, XIII, 1097.

⁶Under the date of 15 March 1624/25 a grant of the rectory to Du Moulin is entered on the Patent Roll of 22 James I, pt. 6; but the grant appears in the Signet Office Docket Book before Du Moulin's signet letter of denization dated 31 March 1626. See Letters of Denization and Acts of Naturalisation for Aliens in England and Ireland, 1603-1700, ed. William G. Shaw (Vol. XVIII, Publications of The Huguenot Society of London, 1911), p. 39.

⁷Ibid., pp. 39, 49.

⁸Cal. State Papers, Domestic, Charles I, 1629-31, pp. 497-498.

⁹Ibid.

¹⁰DNB, XIII, 1097; John and J. A. Vann, Alumni Cantabrigienses (Cambridge, 1924), I, 111, 197; Joseph Foster, Alumni Oxonienses (Oxford, 1891), III (Early Series), 1042.

¹¹Joseph Foster, ed., London Marriage Licenses, 1521-1869 (London, 1887), p. 949. La France Protestante (V, 627) constructs a pedigree which traces the descent of Lt. Gen. Pierre-Louis Du Moulin, one of Frederick the Great's most trusted officers, to Louis Du Moulin, a supposed son of Peter Du Moulin. The account is accepted by DNB (XIII, 1098). Peter Du Moulin, however, appears to have died childless, and the Louis Du Moulin mentioned above was the son of either Dr. Lewis Du Moulin or Cyrus Du Moulin. Henry Wagner reproduces the will of Dr. Peter Du Moulin, dated 7 October 1684 and proved in the Consistory Court of Canterbury on October 13 by his niece, the veriduary legatee and sole executrix, Theodosia Du Moulin (Archaeologia Cantiana, IV, 36-37). The will leaves "to my nephew Louis Du Moulin . . . two messuages in the City of London," and books and pictures to such friends and kinsmen as Dr. John Maximilian De L'Angle, William Longville, Mrs. Elizabeth Tanner, and Mrs. Elizabeth Pilkington. There is no mention of any surviving children.

¹²William Haller in The Rise of Puritanism (New York, 1938), pp. 128-172, has given the classic account of the popular preaching which spread puritanism, and which (pp. 142-143) by developing Pauline images of wayfaring and warfaring, infused a kind of Puritan spiritual epic into its listeners.

¹³Gal. State Papers, Dom., Charles I, 1635, pp. 200, 208, 215; Op. Cit., 1635-36, p. 89.

¹⁴Haller, Rise of Puritanism, pp. 249-258, gives a vivid account of the scene and its effect.

¹⁵See Haller, Rise of Puritanism, pp. 313-323, for a discussion of how the Church's frustration of Milton's plans for a pulpit career eventuated in Comus and especially Lycidas, and how Puritan preaching paved the way for Milton's poetry.

¹⁶G. M. Trevelyan, England Under the Stuarts (London, 1949), p. 154.

¹⁷The details are succinctly presented by Trevelyan, pp. 154-160.

¹⁸The degree was received 10 May 1640, with Du Moulin identifying himself as the rector of St. John's. There is no reason to think he falsified.--Album Studiosorum Academiae Lugduno Batavae, p. 313. The degree was incorporated at Cambridge on 11 June 1640 and at Oxford on 10 October 1656.--Foster, Alumni Oxonienses, III (Early Series), 1042.

¹⁹For a complete discussion, see Sykes, Old Priest and New Presbyter, pp. 74 ff., and especially pp. 85-117.

²⁰David C. A. Agnew, Protestant Exiles from France in the Reign of Louis XIV, 2nd. ed. (London, 1871), p. 12.

²¹Agnew points to the "fraternal" interest which the Huguenots felt in the British troubles. "And even King Charles I," he observes, "though his education, his tendencies, and his connections [including the Catholic Queen Henriette Marie] might alarm them, succeeded to all the loyalty and devotion which the refugees in England felt" for former British kings (French Protestant Exiles, p. 12). A "change of attitude" by Laud "injuriously affected the relation of English Prelacy to foreign Protestantism The one true religion [had not been] an insular monopoly, but a European common property." (Ibid.) Laud's behavior also affected the refugees. He ordered three foreign congregations--at Canterbury, Sandwich, and Maidstone--in the Norwich diocese of Bishop Richard Montague that (1) the English-born children of foreign Protestant immigrants should attend English parish churches; and (2) that the foreign churches their parents attended should, as of 1 March 1636, use the Anglican liturgy translated into their own tongues. The congregations protested first to Montague, their petition being received by Laud Feb. 21 (n.s.); and similarly appealed to Laud himself, this petition being received June 26. Laud answered, ordering them to conform, on 19 August 1635. Prynne cited these circumstances later in the Archbishop's trial.—Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, pp. 13-15, where documents are substantially reproduced.

²²The concern aroused in Holland by the early stages of the English troubles can be seen in the correspondence of the Dutch humanist Gerhard Johann Voss, a friend of Laud. Voss writes Laud uneasily in mid-1629 of the dangers of doctrinal disagreements (Gerardi Joan. Vossii et Clarorum Virorum ad Eum Epistolae, collectore Paulo Colomesio . . . (Augsburg, 1691), Letter 103, I, 152). In May, 1635, Voss writes from Amsterdam to Hugo Grotius, then Swedish ambassador at Paris, that Puritans are defaming the English Church because it venerates Antiquity and draws upon ancient dogma and ritual. How dangerous this is to the Kingdom anyone could find out from the zealots in Holland. Voss speaks of the royal decree that children born in France and Belgium but raised in England must join the national church. He is horrified at the curses and lies with which Zealots have, in his hearing, assailed many of the best English priests, whom he knows personally. The talk that Laud is thinking to restore the Papacy is false.—Letter 258, Epistolae, I, 290-291. From Amsterdam on 21 March 1635, Voss writes Laud of his great surprise at the Scots rising against their King; and of his grieved anger that wicked men blame, not those wanting only novelties in the Church, but the English priestly order on the grounds that it is returning to Papal idolatry.—Ibid., I, 364. The same year he thanks Meric Casaubon for a first-hand account of the English quarrels, because now he can better dispel the accusations that the Royalists are bringing back Romish superstition and tyranny. In October, 1640, Voss writes Laud that documents Laud has sent him (Constitution and Canons of the Council of Canterbury and York, and an account of Laud and the Jesuit Fisher) should blunt the calumnies against the Church, its Bishops, and Laud. Voss prays for the King, Laud's safety, and the concord of England and Scotland.—Letter 395, Ibid., I, 400. In January, 1641, Voss writes to Grotius of his horror at what London Puritans are writing about Laud, and at the Archbishop's arrest and the accusation of treason.—Letter 401, Ibid., I, 407. From the Hague, Voss writes Laud in April, 1641, a disturbed letter of sympathy, turning to God's will for consolation.—Letter 407, Ibid., pp. 413-414.

²³I have used copies in the Folger and Newberry Libraries. It is evident that Puritan propaganda of the sort reflected in Voss's correspondence was going on in France.

²⁴Letter of a French Protestant, p. 51.

²⁵Ibid., p. 1.

²⁶Ibid., p. 3.

²⁷Ibid.

²⁸Ibid., pp. 3-4.

²⁹Ibid., p. 4.

³⁰Ibid., p. 2.

³¹Ibid., pp. 5-6.

³²Ibid., p. 8.

³³Ibid., p. 13. Du Moulin seems to have adopted the episcopal theory maintained earlier by Andrewes and now (1640) being asserted by Bishop Joseph Hall: ". . . the power which Bishops and Priests have under their Universall Bishop Jesus Christ, is equall, as they are Priests. A preheminence and authoritie indeed they have, as Bishops, and that by Apostolicall, and therefore Divine institution. But the power which Christ in the Evangelists immediately giveth to Pastours, concerneth only the preaching of the Word, and administering of the Sacraments, and the power of binding and loosing in foro interiori; Herein they are equall, and all Vicars of Christ"--Ibid., pp. 9-10. Again, ". . . to have Bishops is a commandement, and none of the least; for it is an Apostolicall order: Suppose then that the French breake it . . . it is necessity not choice, that keepeth them from Episcopall order."--Ibid., pp. 5-6.

³⁴Ibid., p. 35.

³⁵Ibid., pp. 36-37.

³⁶Hall was at least partly moved to write Episcopacie by Divine Right by the recantation of their office by two Calvinistic bishops. Alexander Lindsay on 28 November 1639 had resigned the bishopric of Dunkeld, and on 11 February 1639 George Grahame quit the see of Orkney. In his dedication to Charles I, given in Divers Treatises Written upon severall Occasions (London, 1662), 121, Bishop Hall alludes to the resignations. His temper may be gained from his startled reproof of the erring prelates: "Good God! what is this that I have lived to hear? That a Bishop, in a Christian Assembly, should renounce his Episcopall function, and cry mercy for his now abandoned calling? . . . Say therefore, I beseech you, before God and his elect Angels, say what it is . . . say what it can be that induced you to this sinfull, to this scandalous repentance, and take me with you. How wearie should I be of this Rochet, if you can shew me that Episcopacie is of any lesse than divine Institution?" (Treatises, III, 124). Hall summarizes a part of the elder Du Moulin's third letter to Andrewes, praising Episcopacy: "Let me (not without the professions of my dear respects to my ancient and worthy friend D. Molinaeus) tell you what he heartily writes to our late admirable Bishop of Winchester" (Treatises, III, 127). Hall developed the theory of Apostolical, hence divine, institution of Episcopacy, in Part I, Sects. vii-xli, grounding this on Church history and the Fathers (Sect. xiv). Church government was begun by Christ "in a manifest imparity," and so the Apostles, infallibly guided by the Holy Spirit (III, 148), decreed that Episcopacy be the Church's form (Part II, Sects. ii-v). For discussion of the prelatical controversy, see Haller, The Rise of Puritanism, pp. 324-330, especially his appraisal of Bishop Hall (p. 327); for Milton's activity in the quarrel, see pp. 342-363. There is a further discussion of Hall's writing in Haller's Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution (New York, 1955), pp. 32-40; for Milton's anti-prelatical tracts, see pp. 41 ff. Consult also Don M. Wolfe, ed., Complete Prose Works of John Milton, Volume I (1624-1642) (New Haven, 1953), pp. 53-56, 76-86. Hall again cites the elder Du Moulin's third letter to Andrewes in his A Defense of the humble Remonstrance (1641), written in the Saectymman controversy: ". . . learned and worthy Doctor Moulin shall tell them, that the restauration of the English Church, and eversion of Popery, next under God and our King, is chiefly to be ascribed and owed to the learning and industry of our Bishops; some whereof being crowned with Martyrdom subscribed the Gospel with their blood"--Treatises, III, 249. To this, Milton makes a tart rejoinder which is historically debatable and does not reflect the exact sense of Hall's statement: "Moulin sayes in his booke of the calling of Pastors, that because Bishops were the reformers of the Church, therefore they were left remaining: This argument is but of small force to keepe you in your Cathedrals. For first it may be deny'd that Bishops were our first Reformers, for Wickliffe was before them, and his egregious labours are not to be neglected, besides our Bishops were in this worke but the disciples of Priests and began the reformation before they were Bishops and lastly, Moulin's argument directly makes against you, for if there be nothing in it, but this, Bishops were left remaining because they were the reformers of the Church, by as good a consequence therefore they are now to be remov'd, because they have been the most certaine deformaters and ruiners of the Church."--Animadversions upon the Remonstrants Defense against Saectymmanus (1641), Prose Works, I, 734.

³⁷For a succinct account of Baillie's treatise, see Don M. Wolfe, ed., Prose Works, I, 48-52; for his activities, see Haller, Rise of Puritanism, passim.

³⁸See D. M. Wolfe, ed., Prose Works, I, 76-77, for a convenient summary of its contents.

³⁹Consult Ibid., pp. 78-80, for concise account of the pamphlet. Also cf. Haller, Liberty and Reformation, pp. 34-40. As Haller remarks, "The Smectymnians' Answer to Hall's Remonstrance derived its principal importance . . . from the position of its authors and the body of men they represented" (p. 35). See further Arthur E. Barker, Milton and the Puritan Dilemma 1641-1660 (Toronto, 1942), pp. 22, 124-127, 341-342. Barker points out that the Smectymnians wanted reformation, not revolution.

40D. M. Wolfe, ed., Prose Works of Milton, I, 81. The work is analysed, pp. 81-84.

41A thorough review is given by Wolfe, Prose Works, I, 107-128, 193-210. Barker (Milton and the Puritan Dilemma, p. 36) points out that Milton entered the controversy both because of his frustrated plans for the ministry and his belief in his own divine inspiration as a poet; since he was technically excluded from the ministerial class (to which the Smectymnians belonged), "His insistence on the equality of all Christians . . . was very largely the expression of his self-esteem He entered the controversial arena on the side of Puritanism because the reformation of the church seemed to promise the long-sought fulfilment of his powers; but the view of reformation he adopted was modified by his high view of his poetical function." See general discussion, pp. 27-54. Also cf. Haller, Rise of Puritanism, pp. 339-346, 352-363, which further raises Milton's Utopian idealism as a motive; see also Liberty and Reformation, pp. 41-64, 55.

42The usual biographical sketch is in DNB, XIII, 1097. However, the most sympathetic treatment of Lewis Du Moulin is by Douglas Hobbs, "New Light on Louis Du Moulin," Proceedings of the Huguenot Society of London, XV (1933-1937), 489-509. Hobbs corrects Wood's description of Du Moulin--given full value by DNB--as "a fiery, violent, and hot-headed independent, a cross and ill-natured man"

43DNB, XIII, 1097.

44See Haller, Liberty and Reformation, pp. 4-8, 21-22, 105-108. The Puritans failed to create a comprehensive national church, he explains, "because the movement they had promoted had already brought into being a mode of religious organisation, elastic, protean in its adaptability to changing folk experience, and in the event quite ineradicable" (p. 107). After reviewing the conflict between Presbyterian and Independent of the Westminster Assembly in 1644, Haller observes that "all attempts in 1644 to impose a presbyterian frame upon revolutionary Puritanism served simply to evoke the many-headed hydra of English dissent" (p. 142).

45The title page makes the work's intent clear: Rerum nuper in Regno Scotiae Historia, Seu verius Commentarius, Causas, occasiones, progressus horum motuum breviter & perspicue proponens, simul cum synopsi concordiae, quantum hactenus inlita est Addita est

Ecclesiae Scotiae ad Helveticas reformatas Epistola, quâ compendio res tota perspective exhibetur Klautherium. Dantisci [1641].

⁴⁶There was another edition of the same year (n.p.) which had on its title page, instead of "In quâ aperitur . . . redivivum," the clause "In qua Dissertitur de Motibus & controversiis nuper obortis in Anglia, circa Religionem" The content is substantially the same. I have examined both copies at the Folger Library.

⁴⁷La France Prot., V, 800. André Rivet, after ordination in 1595, had been chaplain of the Duc de la Trémouille at Thouars; and after the Duke's death, had been vainly sought by Du Flessis-Mornay for the Academy at Saumur. In 1620 he took the chair of theology at Leyden. In 1632, he left Leyden for Breda, where he was curator of the school and college of Orange. He is mentioned with great approval by Dr. Peter Du Moulin in Gloria ad Coelum, and was naturally sympathetic to the English Royalists. See account in Nouvelle Biographie Générale, XLII, 341.

⁴⁸Epistola, ad Renatum Veridacum, pp. 10-11. In contrast with what Dr. Peter Du Moulin was saying, Lewis Du Moulin (p. 64) seeks to free the elder Du Moulin from accusations of favoring Episcopacy too much in his correspondence with Bishop Andrewes.

⁴⁹Epistola, p. 49.

⁵⁰Ibid., p. 29.

⁵¹Ibid., pp. 13, 20.

⁵²Du Moulin wrote: "Quis non lugeat vicem Ecclesiae Anglicanae, quae sola inter reformatas de his minutulis disputat, & lites movet, usque ad sanguinem? Vacuo crederetur esse cerebro in Galliâ aut Belgio, qui quaestionem moveret circa honorem, quo est colenda mensa, ubi collocanda, an tapetibus ornanda?"—Epistola, p. 42. This reverses the two-edged argument which Peter Du Moulin had advanced in the Letter of a French Protestant.

⁵³Epistola, p. 12.

⁵⁴Vox Populi, pp. 1-2.

⁵⁵Ibid., p. 2.

⁵⁶Ibid., pp. 2-3.

⁵⁷Ibid., p. 3.

58 Ibid.

59 Ibid., pp. 7-8.

60 Ibid.

61 Ibid., p. 8.

62 Ibid., p. 7.

63 Ibid.

64 Ibid., p. 9.

65 Ibid., p. 11.

66 Ibid.

67 Ibid., p. 10.

68 Ibid., p. 11.

69 Consilium de Reformanda Ecclesia Anglicana, p. 15.

70 Consilium, p. 16.

71 Consilium, p. 11.

72 Automaxia, pp. 4-5. The specific date given is 27 February 1640.

73 Automaxia, p. 3.

74 Ibid.

75 Ibid., pp. 72-73.

76 Ibid., pp. 70-71.

77 The Gentleman's Magazine, XLIII (August, 1773), 369, an item submitted as a curiosity by "J.D." It is an introduction, in Du Moulin's handwriting, inserted "in a copy of his Histoire des Nouveaux Presbyteriens Anglois et Ecossois, Seconde Edition, 1660, presented by him to the library of Christ Church, Canterbury," of which Du Moulin was a canon. (Ibid.) The title Du Moulin had originally given the book, as he listed it on an inserted leaf, we have quoted above. La France Prot., V, 825, describes the original Apologie as an octavo, published in 1650. Du Moulin's account, quoted above, goes on: "This French book was translated into English by some ingenious traveller [usually identified as Matthew Playford], who yet hath shewed sufficiently that he had not the genius of the French tongue: and he changed the title, and intituled it History of the Presbyterians, although such an history was not treated or intended in the book, but occasionally. About eleven years after this French book was printed, it came into the hands of the Reverend Doctor Cosins // at Paris, who carried it to the king [Charles II], then at Colomb neere Paris. Having read before him some pages of it, he said to his majesty, 'Sir, you shall never do enough for the author of this book'; and advised him by all means to get it printed, as most conducive to the present posture of his affaires. His majesty, though short of money gave him sixteen Lewises to reprint it, which was done at Paris by that Doctor's care, who altered and inserted several things in it in point of history, wherein he, living in France in the time of the rebellion, was not so well informed as I who then lived in England Two months after, his majesty came into England. And when I had the honour to kiss his hand, I found him as good as his royal word."--Gent. Mag., pp. 369-370. I have quoted from the 1659 translation. Alterations made in the book because of the King's death also followed (as we shall see below) publication of Salmasius's Defensio Regia in 1649, and are sizeable enough that we must consider the History along with Clamor ad Coelum (1652), which it often parallels. Since both works have the same purpose, to render the Puritans infamous abroad, the changes in the History still leave it representative of Du Moulin's original intention.

⁷⁸The English version was entitled The History of the English & Scotch Presbytery. Wherein is discovered their Designs and Practises for the Subversion of Government in Church and State. Written in French, by an Eminent Divine of the Reformed Church, and now Englished (Villa Franca, 1659).

⁷⁹The Declaratio is a Latin version of various documents concerning the juncture of Scots and English in an expedition into England in 1644. The title page avers that the declaration was promulgated by Parliament and by the General Assembly of Scotland in that year. The translation was more Puritan propaganda for a foreign audience.

⁸⁰Foster, Alumni Oxonienses, III (Early Series), 1042. For a good review of the general temper of England at this time, see G. M. Trevelyan, England Under the Stuarts, pp. 225-229.

⁸¹Trevelyan, Op. Cit., pp. 226-228. For the text of the Self-Denying Ordinance, see Stephenson and Marchant, Sources of English Constitutional History (New York, 1937), pp. 506-507.

⁸²Trevelyan, p. 228.

⁸³Ibid.

⁸⁴Ibid., pp. 230-234.

⁸⁵Ibid., pp. 232-235. For the Heads of the Proposals, see Sources Const. Hist., pp. 507-511.

⁸⁶Trevelyan, p. 235.

⁸⁷The substantial text of the act is given in Sources Const. Hist., p. 516. The language of grounds cited for Charles's trial already assumes his guilt. Trevelyan's appraisal (England Under the Stuarts, pp. 239-240) is also worth noting.

⁸⁸When the poem was republished in his ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ. Poematum Libelli Tres (Cambridge, 1670; augm. 1671), it provided the title for Book II. The title page stated "Proximo post placulare Regicidium mense, Londini primum editi." The work will be discussed in connection with Du Moulin as an Anglo-Latin poet.

⁸⁹Cal. State Papers, Domestic, 1649-1650, p. 177. See also Ibid., p. 233.

⁹⁰History of the English and Scotch Presbytery, Sigs. a-a8^v.

⁹¹Ibid., Sigs. A2-A8^v.

⁹²Ibid., Sigs. b-c^v.

⁹³Ibid., Sig. a8.

⁹⁴Ibid., Sigs. A6-A6^v.

⁹⁵Ibid., Sigs. a5^v-a6.

⁹⁶Ibid.

⁹⁷Ibid., p. 216.

⁹⁸Ibid.

⁹⁹Ibid., Sig. a6.

¹⁰⁰Ibid., p. 218. In the same year, Lewis Du Moulin published his treatise The Power of the Christian Magistrate in Sacred Things (London, 1650), which also discusses the relationship of the Church and civil power. Perez Zagorin, in A History of Political Thought in the English Revolution (London, 1954), p. 71, finds the book "distinguished by its unequivocal employment of the Hobbesian doctrine of sovereignty to justify its power"; and asserts there is "no doubt that Hobbes was one of his masters." Du Moulin's book is worth quotation, for it is a reasonable plea for toleration which still admits the real problems of ecclesiastical administration in an age of state churches. Du Moulin bases allegiance on possession of power: ". . . the Law hath alwayes provided, that Allegiance should be given him to whom the Imperiall Crowne of these Realmes shall descend, by which Imperiall Crowne, the Person is not principally meant, but the Realme; . . . none will, I thinke, understand the lawfull Heires and Successours of the Crowne, but him, or them that are actually in possession of the Governement; . . . for sure, unlawfull possession of a Crowne doth not exempt subjects from the same Allegiance that the most lawfull Sovereigne can challenge; for even I should much doubt, whether Subjects may call any Supremacy of power unlawfull, or whether a Supreme Governour is not a lawfull Governour; however, possession is the great condition required for the duty of Allegiance" (pp. 28-29) Furthermore, "God having equally entrusted" the Magistrate "over all persons, and causes, in a Christian Common-wealth: In the discharge of which trust, it were to be wished, that all Christian Magistrates would governe without that distinction of Powers, Ecclesiasticall, and Civill" (pp. 150-151). Whatever their claims of preaching inspiration, ministers--here he seems to glance at the Presbyterians--should be advisors and not share the reins of government: "But that the Pastours . . . are not the fittest to have a Supreme Jurisdiction over persons and causes, they call Ecclesiasticall, reason, and the sad experience of former times teacheth us: for were they endowed with knowledge by Revelation; or had Ecclesiasticall Assemblies compounded meereley of Divines, a non-erring gift not communicable to any other Assemblies of men; I should willingly, and necessarily admit that Divines ought to be assisting the Christian Magistrate . . . as Iudges coequall to them, yea, Superiours in that Jurisdiction, which they challenge to themselves; but the gifts of Government, being not inseparably joined with those of preaching, and the Ministers not being endowed with infallibility . . . , I do not see but that their proper place is to be counsellors to the Sovereigne power in matters belonging to the Kingdome of heaven" If "there is but one power of Legislation and Jurisdiction . . . belonging to the Supreme Magistrate, I conceive that then Bishops & overseers set over many Congregations . . . will much ease the Supreme power of the care they must take in ordering persons and causes nearer concerning the Kingdome of heaven" (pp. 108-110). But in case of divided civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, a "few Bishops set over Presbyters, and being Independent from any other power, have a greater opportunity to Lord and tyrannise over the Christian peoples, then a numerous company of Presbyters . . . can have." (p. 111) But because man is social, "I see not, but the meetings of congregations of those called Independents are very commendable, and not to be enquired after by the Sovereigne Magistrate, nor by Synods which cannot be proved to be of Divine institution, but have taken their originall from those kinds of naturall and innocent meetings" (p. 74).

101 Gentleman's Magazine, XLIII (August, 1773), 369.

102 Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, Index Volume, p. 119.

103 Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, I, 20.

104 DNB, XIII, 1097.

105 Foster, Alum. Oxon., III (Early Series), 1042. Since Oxford was under Puritan domination at this time, it is clear that Du Moulin was successful in concealing his Royalist views and authorship of the three offensive works.

106 DNB, XIII, 1097; Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, Index Vol., 119.

107 Foster, Op. Cit., p. 1042; DNB, XIII, 1097; Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, Index Vol., 119.

108 In the 2nd. ed., rev. and corr., Du Moulin gives a metaphorical account of the work's composition. Dedicated to Richard Boyle, now Earl of Burlington and Cork and Lord High Treasurer of Ireland, the book is offered as "fruits grown and ripened at the rays of your favour, and as characters of those vertues whereby you have wrestled out the difficulties of an age of Iron and Fire." (Sig. A3) Referring to his stay in Ireland, during which the book was probably started, Du Moulin says: "Some years ago being cast by the storm upon a remote coast, and judging that it would have been to no purpose for me to quarrel with the tempest, I sate upon the shore to behold it calmly; taking no other interest in it, but that of my sympathy with those friends whom I saw yet beaten by the wind and waves. And to that calmness my condition contributed very much, because former tempests had left me little occasion to be much concerned in the present agitation, or to fear much those which might come after. "There I found my self invited to husband that uncertain interval of unexpected rest, to meditate by what means I might possess every where, and in the very storm, the Peace and Contentment of my Mind; And to try whether I could be so happy, while I got peace for my self, to procure it unto others. "For that Contemplation I made use of four Books, the half wild Country where I found my self affording but few more. The first and chief was the Holy Scripture My second Book was the great Volume of Nature. The third was the lessons of Divine Providence. And the fourth that which every one carrieth along with himself, and that is Man" (Sigs. Ah-Ah^v)

109 Though witchcraft and the New Science are to be treated in the next chapter, the witchcraft prosecutions of the Interregnum are of concern here. Wallace Notestein, A History of Witchcraft in England from 1558 to 1718 (Washington, 1911), p. 195, points out that Hopkins and Stearne in fourteen months sent to the gallows "more witches than all the other witchhunters of England can be proved . . . to have hung" in the 160 years of the persecution. Why? For one thing, England "was in a state of judicial anarchy," with prejudiced local authorities, eager for convictions, in control (pp. 200-201). Furthermore, one must "face the unpleasant facts that the witch persecution coincided in time with the Presbyterian rule and in place with Puritan communities. It is very hard to get around these facts." (p. 198; pp. 195-200) There was also the agitation of the war; its unusual conditions made the crusade possible (p. 205). But by 1653 "the equilibrium of England had been restored. Cromwell's government was beginning to run smoothly. The courts were in full swing It is not surprising, then, that the Protectorate was one of the most quiet periods in the annals of witchcraft." (p. 219)

110 Du Moulin's book appeared when there were several acquittals and few convictions for witchcraft. See Moteststein, pp. 410-411. The Restoration literature to which the Divell of Mascon belongs will be discussed in our next chapter.

111 MSB, XIII, 1097.

112 Album Stud. Lugd., p. 202.

113 Foster, Alum. Oxon., III (Early Series), 1042.

114 Letters of Denization and Acts of Naturalization, p. 68.

115 Ibid., p. 70.

116 On 8 November 1654, the Council of State considered a petition of Lewis Du Moulin for a patent for payment with arrears of the pension of £100 a year granted by Parliament to his father and charged on Goldsmiths' Hall. On 17 November 1654 the committee to which it had been referred favored payment from June 24 (Cal. State Papers, Dom., 1654, p. 392). On 12 December 1654 the Council ordered the pension paid with arrears (Ibid., p. 409). On 13 April 1658, the Council, with Cromwell present, advised the Treasury Commissioners to pay him the same pension as to his father (Cal. State Papers, Dom., 1657-58, p. 365); and on 1 July 1658 the Council ordered that instead of the £100-a-year pension advised on April 13, one of £250 be advised, "on his relinquishing his interest in a donative valued at £150 a year." (Cal. State Papers, Dom., 1659, p. 365).

NOTES TO CHAPTER IV

¹Heroic Stanzas, XXXVII, in The Poetical Works of Dryden, new ed., rev. and enl., by George R. Noyes (Boston, 1950), p. 7.

²Ibid., p. 11, ll. 320-323.

³The Works of Sir Thomas Browne, ed. Charles Sayle, 3 vols. (Edinburgh, 1912), I, 99.

⁴Samson Agonistes, ed. F. A. Patterson, in The Works of John Milton, gen. ed. F. A. Patterson, 18 vols. in 21 (New York, 1931-1938), I, Pt. 2, 347-348. Unless otherwise specified, all citations of Milton's works are made to this ("Columbia") edition.

⁵The dual restoration is discussed by G. M. Trevelyan, England Under the Stuarts, pp. 276-290.

⁶Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1660-1661, p. 14.

⁷Ibid.; Dart, History and Antiquities of Canterbury, "The History of the Canons of Christ Church," p. 200. Peter Du Moulin vainly sought to help his now-unfortunate brother Dr. Lewis Du Moulin by transferring to him the rectory of Llanrhaiadar in County Denbigh. The diocesan bishop, claiming that the rectory was in his gift, soon took it away from Lewis Du Moulin. In August, 1660, Peter Du Moulin filed a petition for restoration of the rectory to his brother Lewis, together with the place of history reader at Oxford University (the Camden professorship), taken away from him by the visitors of the University after the Restoration. Both attempts of Peter Du Moulin were apparently unsuccessful because of Lewis Du Moulin's zeal for the Puritan cause in the Interregnum.—Cal. State Papers, Dom., 1660-1661, p. 230.

⁸Dart, Canterbury, p. 175.

⁹A native of Reading in Berkshire, of which his father was mayor and alderman, Turner had been a Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, and a pupil of Juxon, and was later domestic chaplain to Archbishop Laud. He died 8 October 1672 and was buried December 17 in the Chapel of the Virgin Mary. He was 81. See Dart, Canterbury, p. 190; John Le Neve, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae . . . (London, 1716), p. 10. Dated 2 January 1643/4 at Oxford, there is a letter from King Charles I to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury dispensing Dr. Turner from a personal installation because of the dangers of the times, and ordering the chapter to admit him by proxy.—Archaeologia Cantiana, XLII, 118.

¹⁰Dart, Canterbury, p. 203. Aside from the usual DNB account, two of the best sources of information about Meric Casaubon are Dart, Canterbury, pp. 63-64, and Jean Senebier, Histoire Littéraire de Geneve, 3 vols. (Geneva, 1786), II, 182-187, with bibliography. He appears incidentally in Pattison's biography of his father Isaac Casaubon.

¹¹For the general discussion of seventeenth-century thought here, I am indebted to such works as Andrew D. White, A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom, 2 vols. (New York, 1896), I, 130-170, 373-415; II, 97-125, 135-157; A. L. Burt, The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Science (London, 1925), passim; A. Wolf, A History of Science, Technology, and Philosophy in the 16th and 17th Centuries, new ed. by Douglas McKie (London, 1950); A. R. Hall, The Scientific Revolution 1500-1800: The Formation of the Modern Scientific Attitude (London, 1954); Paul H. Kocher, Science and Religion in Elizabethan England (San Marino, 1953); Ernst Cassirer, The Platonic Renaissance in England, tr. J. P. Pettigrove (Austin, Tex., 1953); E. A. George, Seventeenth Century Men of Latitude: Forerunners of the New Theology (New York, 1908); Richard Foster Jones, Ancients and Moderns: A Study of the Background of the Battle of the Books (St. Louis, 1936); Jones et al., The Seventeenth Century: Studies in the History of English Thought and Literature from Bacon to Pope by Richard Foster Jones and Others Writing in His Honor (Stanford, 1951); L. I. Bredvold, The Intellectual Milieu of John Dryden: Studies in Some Aspects of Seventeenth Century Thought (Ann Arbor, 1934); Herschel Baker, The Wars of Truth: Studies in the Decay of Christian Humanism in the Earlier Seventeenth Century (Cambridge, Mass., 1952); Perry Miller, The New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century (Cambridge, Mass., 1954); Kester Svendsen, Milton and Science (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Howard Schultz, Milton and Forbidden Knowledge (New York, 1955); Wallace Notestein, A History of Witchcraft in England from 1558 to 1718 (Washington, D.C., 1911); Jackson I. Cope, Joseph Glanvill, Anglican Apologist (St. Louis, 1956); Jackson I. Cope and H. W. Jones, eds., History of the Royal Society By Thomas Sprat (St. Louis, 1958), Introduction by Cope, pp. xli-xciii; Basil Willey, The Seventeenth Century Background: Studies in the Thought of the Age in Relation to Poetry and Religion (London, 1934).

In general, the material in this chapter is based on my own reading of primary sources. I have tried to give due credit to the foregoing scholarly works where it has seemed especially pertinent.

¹²Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, tr. Henry Beveridge, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1957), I, v, 9-10, pp. 57-58.

¹³Ibid., p. 57.

¹⁴Ibid., p. 51.

¹⁵Ibid., p. 58.

¹⁶Kocher, Science and Religion in Elizabethan England, p. 322.

¹⁷Ibid., pp. 324-325. Cf. the discussion of Calvinism and receptivity to science in Elizabethan England, pp. 9 ff.

¹⁸See R. F. Jones, Ancients and Moderns, pp. 92-123, 154-187; Perry Miller, The New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century, pp. 207-235, esp. pp. 222 ff. For a convenient discussion of Calvinism as allied with practical capitalism, see Herschel Baker, The Dignity of Man: Studies in the Persistence of an Idea (Cambridge, Mass., 1947), pp. 328-333.

¹⁹Accessible reviews of skepticism in England are found in Kocher, Science and Religion in Elizabethan England, pp. 45-62, 323, 324; Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu of John Dryden, pp. 16-46; and Baker, Wars of Truth, 144-154.

²⁰Dart, Canterbury, pp. 63-64.

²¹Ibid.; Senebier, Histoire Littéraire, II, 182-183.

²²Dart, Canterbury, pp. 63-64.

²³Ibid., p. 64.

²⁴Treatise Concerning Enthusiasme, pp. 4, 28-32.

²⁵Academiarum Examen, p. 67.

²⁶Ibid., p. 78.

²⁷See R. F. Jones, Ancients and Moderns, pp. 105-115; Baker, Wars of Truth, pp. 178-180.

²⁸This is, of course, the pervasive theme of White's Warfare of Science with Theology, where it is perhaps best exemplified in his account of the Roman Church's abuse of Galileo, I, 130-170. See also Wolf, History of Science, Technology, and Philosophy, pp. 8-9, 35-38.

²⁹Jones, Ancients and Moderns, pp. 142-144, 236-242; Baker, Wars of Truth, p. 179.

³⁰Cf. Note 18.

³¹For a complete account of the founding and growth of these institutions, see Martha Ornstein [Bronfenbrenner], The Role of Scientific Societies in the Seventeenth Century (Chicago, 1938). There are also sketches in Wolf's History of Science, previously cited. See also Hall, The Scientific Revolution, p. 204.

³²Jones, Ancients and Moderns, pp. 236 ff.; Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, 47-65; Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 32, 46, 120, 130; Cope, Introduction to Sprat's History of the Royal Society, pp. xii-xxiii.

³³The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661), ed. Moody E. Prior (New York, 1931), pp. 222-223.

³⁴Ibid., p. 150.

³⁵Ibid., p. 152.

³⁶Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, p. 62; Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 17-18.

³⁷Kocher, Science and Religion, pp. 60-63; Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, pp. 20-46; Baker, Wars of Truth, pp. 146 ff.; Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 104-120; Schultz, Milton and Forbidden Knowledge, pp. 157-183.

³⁸Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, pp. 53-58.

³⁹Cope, Introduction to Sprat's History, pp. xxiii-xxiv.

⁴⁰Sprat, The History of the Royal-Society of London, For the Improving of Natural Knowledge (London, 1667), p. 24. I have used the copy in the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington. For convenience of the reader, however, this is the edition reproduced by Cope; page numbers correspond.

⁴¹Ibid., p. 345.

⁴²Ibid., p. 377.

⁴³Ibid., pp. 377-378.

⁴⁴Ibid., p. 82.

⁴⁵Ibid., pp. 82-83.

⁴⁶Ibid., p. 374.

⁴⁷Ibid., p. 360.

⁴⁸Ibid., p. 374.

⁴⁹cf. Note 38. Sprat, History, p. 101.

⁵⁰Ibid., pp. 28-39.

51 Ibid., pp. 106-107.

52 Ibid., p. 102.

53 Ibid., pp. 150-319.

54 Ibid., Notes and Appendices, pp. 68-69. See also Jackson I. Cope's Introduction to his edition of Plus Ultra Or The Progress and Advancement of Knowledge Since the Days of Aristotle (1668) (Gainesville, 1958), pp. v-ix, and Glanvill's "Epistle," p. 6. I have used the copy of Plus Ultra in the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington. Page numbers, however, correspond to those in Cope's edition. See discussions in R. F. Jones, Ancients and Moderns, pp. 247-272; Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 22-30; Baker, Wars of Truth, pp. 88-89, 357, 362.

55 Plus Ultra, "Epistle," p. 6.

56 Cope, Introduction to Plus Ultra, pp. v-ix.

57 Plus Ultra (ed. Cope), "Preface," pp. 23-24.

58 Plus Ultra, p. 127.

59 Ibid., pp. 128-129.

60 Plus Ultra (ed. Cope), "Preface," p. 27.

61 Ibid., pp. 27-28.

62 Plus Ultra, p. 112.

63 As against the undoubted virtues of Boyle, Glanvill drew a picture (pp. 78, 124-125) of Aristotle as an unscrupulous literary pirate and sinister character.

64 Plus Ultra, pp. 92-110.

65 Plus Ultra (ed. Cope), "Preface," pp. 24-26.

66 Ibid., pp. 26-27.

67 In addition to frequent references to his ill-health in Casaubon's own works, there is a poignant treatment of the subject in Peter Du Moulin's Latin poem Schola Morti, discussed in the next chapter.

68 Letter to Peter Du Moulin, p. 1.

69 Ibid.

⁷⁰Ibid., pp. 1-2.

⁷¹Ibid., pp. 5-6.

⁷²Ibid., p. 7.

⁷³See the suggestive remarks by Basil Willey, The Seventeenth Century Background, pp. 3-7, concerning the differing qualities of explanations required with shifts in attitudes and interests, e.g., from satisfaction through a theological explanation to a need for one in terms of material causes and effects, according to what sort of mystery needs clearing up.

⁷⁴Letter to Peter Du Moulin, p. 2.

⁷⁵Ibid., pp. 3-4.

⁷⁶Ibid., p. 36.

⁷⁷Ibid., p. 25.

⁷⁸Ibid., p. 24.

⁷⁹Ibid.

⁸⁰Willey, Seventeenth Century Background, pp. 31-40; Schultz, Milton and Forbidden Knowledge, passim.

⁸¹Letter to Peter Du Moulin, p. 25.

⁸²Ibid., p. 30.

⁸³"Men that are much fixed upon matter and secondary causes and sensual objects, if great care be not taken, may in time, (there be many examples) and by degrees forget that there be such things in the world as Spirits, substances really existing and of great power, though not visible, or palpable by their nature; forget I say, and consequently discredit supernatural operations: and at last, that there is a God, and that their souls are immortal. This is a great precipice; and the contempt of all other learning an ill presage."---Ibid., p. 30.

⁸⁴"I cannot tell what should make the Metaphysicks, that noble science, so despicable unto them: them I mean, who have declared themselves and their opinion of it. Indeed, they have nothing to do with the senses, and may be called Notional: but real though, and the more abstracted from the senses, therefore more divine. What a coil hath been kept with Cartesius's Ego cogito: to prove the immortality of the soul thereby? How much more effectually may it be proved by the capacity men have of Metaphysical contemplations, or the consideration of Ens quatenus Ens, so abstracted from all that is sensual and material? For my part, I profess, (next the mysteries of our faith) I never have been more sensible of the immortality of humane souls, then when I had the happiness to be conversant with that noble science."

--Ibid.

85Ibid., pp. 30-31.

86Ibid., p. 6.

87Ibid., pp. 9-10.

88Ibid.

89Ibid., pp. 20-21.

90Ibid., p. 17.

91Ibid., pp. 23-24.

92Ibid., pp. 17-18.

93Ibid., p. 17.

94Ibid., p. 18.

95Ibid.

96Because of the relative civility with which Casaubon had treated him in replying to Plus Ultra, Glanvill suppressed a reply to the Letter to Peter Du Moulin.--Cope, Joseph Glanvill, p. 30.

97On 3 July 1671, Du Moulin wrote Boyle from Canterbury, saying in a postscript that he and his wife wished to be remembered to Lady Ranelagh and her daughters. See The Works of the Honourable Robert Boyle, ed. T. Birch, 5 vols. (London, 1744), V, 595.

98Du Moulin's Latin poetry will be discussed in Chapter V. See Leicester Bradner, Musae Anglicanae: A History of Anglo-Latin Poetry 1500-1925 (New York, 1940), pp. 97-98.

99See Chapter V, Note 39.

100Ibid.

101Boyle, Works, V, 594.

102Ibid.

103 The poem praised Gunning's personal character and constancy to the Anglican Church during the period of Puritan military rule; moreover, it addressed him by his first name throughout.--ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ (Cambridge, 1671), III, 108-109.

104 Boyle, Works, V, 594-595.

105 ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, Incrementum, pp. 52-54.

106 Jones, Ancients and Moderns, p. 354, n. 62.

107 For example, in Cowley's ode to the Royal Society prefixed to Sprat's History, or Dryden's Annus Mirabilis (Poetical Works, ed. Noyes, p. 40), CLXI-CLXVI, and his Epistle to Dr. Charlton (Works, pp. 17-18), ll. 1-32.

108 I have quoted the copy in the Newberry Library of A Treatise of Peace & Contentment of Mind. By Peter Du Moulin D.D. Canon of Christs Church Canterbury: One of His Majesties Chaplains Second edition revised and amended by the Author . . . (London, 1671). This justly popular work went through many editions in French and English.

109 Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, pp. 20-46; Baker, Wars of Truth, pp. 146 ff.

110 The best account is by Bredvold, Intellectual Milieu, pp. 20-46.

111 Ibid., p. 40.

112 Ibid., pp. 35-36.

113 I have quoted the influential English version of De la Sagesse, Of Wisdome Three Bookes Written in French by Peter Charrō Doct^r of Lawe in Paris. Translated by Samson Lennard (London, [1612]), p. 467. I have used the copies in the Newberry Library, Chicago, and the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington.

114 Treatise of Peace & Contentment of Mind, Sig. A[5].

115 Ibid., Sig. A4^v.

116 Ibid.

117 Ibid., Sig. A[5]^v.

118 Ibid., Sig. A[6].

119 Ibid., Sig. A[7].

120Ibid., p. 268.

121Ibid., p. 180.

122Ibid., p. 185.

123Ibid., pp. 181-183.

124Ibid., p. 177.

125Ibid., p. 180.

126Ibid., p. 179.

127Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 91-92. Hobbes wrote: "From this ignorance of how to distinguish Dreams, and other strong Fancies, from Vision and Sense, did arise the greatest part of the Religion of the Gentiles in times past, that worshipped Satyres, Fawnes, Nymphs, and the like; and now adayes the opinion that rude people have of Fayries, Ghosts, and Goblins; and of the power of Witches. For as for Witches, I think not that their witchcraft is any reall power; but yet that they are justly punished, for the false beliefs they have, that they can do such mischief, joyned with their purpose to do it if they can; their trade being neerer to a new Religion, than to a Craft or Science."--Hobbes's Leviathan, Reprinted from the Edition of 1651, with essay by W. G. Fegson Smith (Oxford, 1952), p. 17. Cf. the similar remark by Selden in The Table-Talk of John Selden, ed. S. W. Singer and W. S. W. Anson (London, n.d.), p. 231.

128His A History of Witchcraft in England from 1558 to 1718 (Washington, 1911) remains, despite such later treatments of the subject as those by Kittredge and Summers, the best balanced and generally satisfactory account of the witch mania.

129Climaxing his discussion of religion as superstition, arising from man's concern about and desire to know the future (Leviathan, pp. 81-88), Hobbes says that later prognostics were added "Sometimes in the insignificant Speeches of Mad-men, supposed to be possessed with a divine Spirit; which Possession they called Enthusiasme; and these kinds of foretelling events, were accounted Theomancy, or Prophecy: Sometimes in the aspect of the Starres at their Nativity; which was called Horoscopy, and esteemed a part of judiciary Astrology; Sometimes in their own hopes and feares, called Thumomancy, or Presage; Sometimes in the Prediction of Witches, that pretended conference with the dead; which is called Necromancy, Conjuring, and Witchcraft; and is but juggling and confederate knavery"

130Equally bizarre are the history and contents of the book.

Upon the recommendation of Archbishop Ussher, the book was communicated by Sir Robert Cotton to Casaubon for editing and printing, and was in very imperfect condition. Following Dr. Dee's death in December, 1608, Sir Robert bought the remnant of Dee's library including the MS. of the book and Dee's magic table. Since the book had been buried in the earth for some time, it began to molder and perish despite excellent care after its rescue. Therefore, Sir Thomas Cotton, the son and heir of Sir Robert, had it copied, and from this copy the book was printed. Casaubon believed it was the only copy extant. A True Relation covers the activities of Dr. John Dee from 28 May 1583 to 7 September 1607; in its fragmentary form, the biggest gap occurs between 4 April 1587 and 20 March 1607. (Casaubon, "Preface" to A True Relation, Sig. F[2]^v).

Dee and Kelly visited the Emperor Rodolphe 3 September 1584, and King Stephen of Poland on 23 May and 27 June 1585. Both potentates must have been startled by the messages passed on from the spirit world by Kelly and Dee. The Emperor (pp. 230-231) was rebuked for his evil deeds by the "Angel of the Lord"; while to King Stephen, the Angel Uriel gave an exhortation to leave off his foul sins, become a valiant soldier for the Lord, and thus to prosper with Divine blessing (pp. 405-406).

¹³¹Ibid., Sig. H[2]^r.

¹³²For an account of the evolution of A Philosophical Endeavour into the posthumous Sadducismus Triumphatus edited by More, see Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 87-103, esp. 91-97. The literary war over witchcraft is detailed by Moteststein, History of Witchcraft, pp. 284-312; see also discussion by Basil Willey, The Seventeenth Century Background, pp. 188-204. Convenient accounts of the thought of Henry More, which influenced Glanvill, are contained in A. L. Burtt, Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Science, pp. 127-144; Ernst Cassirer, The Platonic Renaissance in England, pp. 65-67, 123-128, 130-133, 145-147; see also Willey, Op. Cit., pp. 160-169.

¹³³Casaubon's treatise Of Credulity and Incredulity in things Natural, Civil, and Divine (1668) was reissued in 1672 with the addition of only a new title page which perverted the emphasis of the book into sensationalism: A Treatise Proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by Pregnant Instances and Evidence: Together with other Things worthy of Note. As the subtitle of Credulity and Incredulity indicates, Casaubon sought to discredit atheism by using the material of demonology and witchcraft as proofs; to discuss the relative dangers of credulity and incredulity to faith; to discredit Hobbes and his atomistic and deterministic teachings; and to promote ancient learning against innovations. The Treatise Proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, except for the new title page, is in every regard identical with the 1668 book Of Credulity and Incredulity. The Folger Shakespeare Library copy of the Treatise, which I have used, is signed "George Whichcot" on the title page.

In his preface "To the Reader," Casaubon wrote (Sig. A[7]^r) that ill health had prevented completion at the time (1668) of the promised third part of Credulity and Incredulity, that dealing with divine matters. It was, however, completed in 1670 with Of Credulity and Incredulity in things Divine and Spiritual.

Casaubon admitted that "whereas my title promiseth the consideration of both equally, Credulity and Incredulity; and most of my examples will be found of Incredulity, or such as tend to the reproof and confutation of it, I may be thought to have dealt partially, as though I favoured, or less blamed Credulity, than the contrary vice. But that doth not follow, neither had I any such respect, in the chusing of my examples But I must confess, the business of incredulity did more run in my head at this time, because of the times so set on Atheism, which of all kind of incredulity, is the most horrible, and damnable, and most unworthy of a rational man. Now one prime foundation of Atheism . . . being the not believing the existence of spiritual essences, whether good or bad; separate, or united; subordinate to God, as to the suprem, and original cause of all; and by consequent the denying of supernatural operations: I have, I confess, applied my self, by my examples, which in this case do more than any reasoning; and (the authority of the holy Scriptures laid aside) are almost the only convincing proof; to the confutation of such incredulity" (pp. 7-8) For his attacks on skepticism, the Royal Society, Descartes, and the atomistic philosophy, see respectively pp. 155; 296; 224; 14-15, 133.

The evils proceeding from the extremes of credulity and incredulity, Casaubon stated thus: "From ungrounded belief, gross superstition, by which true Religion is not a little infected and adulterated, hath proceeded: but, from the contrary, right down Atheism (whether openly professed, or palliated, as the fashion is:) by which all sense of piety, all sense of immortality, being taken away, and nothing left to man, but what is common unto bruits . . . man may truly be said, to be metamorphosed into another creature" (p. 2).

¹³⁴In Joseph Glanvill: A Study in English Thought and Letters of the Seventeenth Century (New York, 1900), Ferris Greenslet says that Glanvill "had no complete and consistent system of ideas, in the sense that Descartes or Spinoza had. His sympathetic and harmonizing intention sometimes led him into capricious eclecticism. His philosophy, like a chameleon, took some shades of color from the ground it was upon; now sceptical with Sextus Empiricus, anon Pythagorean with More, rationalistic with Descartes, or experimental with Bacon, it finally culminated in a reasonable and broad-minded Platonism" (p. 89). Of Glanvill and witchcraft, he declares that "Whether it be from the remoteness of the subject to our thoughts, or from the peculiar character of the evidence involved, or from subtile, adumbrating, unsettling causes innate in the idea of the supernatural, Glanvill, in writing of witches, is not quite himself. That his reasoning should not be clear and convincing as in his other work is doubtless the effect of the first two causes. But there is likewise a strange dullness of his literary sense and faculty, which . . . is best referred to the last." (p. 159).

Not perceiving that scientific skepticism is the key to Glanvill's attitude toward witchcraft cases, Greenslett throws up a verbal smoke screen to conceal his bafflement: "How is a belief in witches and ghosts—for to Glanvill these were kindred phenomena—to be reconciled with his careful scepticism, and to his sympathy with the scientific pursuits of the Royal Society? . . . it is possible to oppose certain considerations which make this peculiar adumbration of his faculties less dark and unintelligible. In all ages the subtlest philosophical minds have had a keen interest in 'occult' or unexplained phenomena As we have already seen, despite his Pyrrhonism, Glanvill had this type of restless, adventurous intellect, eager to dwell in haunted places and to embrace fair immaterial forms. His imagination, having pried into natural phenomena beyond the point reached by most men of his time, and yet having found no bottom, was the more ready to believe, hypothetically at least, in deeper things beyond" (pp. 145-146).

135Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 97-98.

136Of his addition of stories and Scriptural evidence for witchcraft in A Klow beyond what had appeared in his Considerations, Glanvill avers: "That there MAY be WITCHES and Apparitions in our dayes, notwithstanding the Objections of the Modern Sadduce, I believe I have made appear in the CONSIDERATIONS following; in which I did not primarily intend direct proof, but DEFENCE, as the Title of the first Edition, which is restor'd in this mention'd. But I have now added the evidence of the Divine Oracles, and two Relations of Fact, that are clear and unexceptionable. I have no humour nor delight in telling Stories, and do not publish these, for the gratification of those that have; but I record them as Arguments for the confirmation of a Truth, which hath indeed been attested by multitudes of the like evidences in all places, and times . . ." ("Preface," A Klow at Modern Sadducism, Sig. A[7]^{rev}).

137A Klow at Modern Sadducism, pp. 93-126.

138Ibid., pp. 126-134.

139Ibid., pp. 137-160.

140"I THINK there is nothing in the instances mention'd," Glanvill wrote, "but what may as well be accounted for by the Rules of Reason and Philosophy, as the ordinary affairs of Nature. For in resolving natural Phenomena, we can only assign the probable causes, shewing how things may be, not presuming how they are. And in the particulars under our Examen, we may give an account how 'tis possible, and not unlikely, that such things (though somewhat varying from the common rode of Nature) may be acted. And if our narrow and contracted mindes can furnish us with apprehensions of the way and manner of such performances, though perhaps not the true ones, 'tis an argument that such things may be effected by creatures, whose powers and knowledge are so vastly exceeding ours" (A Flow, pp. 15-16). In the spirit of scientific hypotheses, Glanvill offered what he thought were possible explanations, in terms of natural causes, of the transportation of witches, the separability of the soul, and the physical effects of witches' supposed anointing of themselves before taking flight (Ibid., pp. 13-14). Of the scientific skepticism which enabled Glanvill to believe in witches, Moody E. Prior gives a convincing summary: "It was however, a skepticism which took the form, not of the classical epoché--the suspension of belief--but of the tentative suspension of disbelief that was for Glanvill a necessary element of the scientific attitude. Hence the paradox that Glanvill believed in witches because he was a skeptic. Nor is this to be wondered at; for seventeenth-century scientists--impressed by the difficulty of discovering causes for natural phenomena; willing, as a result of striking reversals of old views by new discoveries and the restoration of older theories that had once been discarded; to entertain any hypothesis until they were convinced that it was untenable; and ambitious enough to consider all obscure, trivial, or extraordinary events worthy of their attention--allowed their opposition to dogmatism to lead them to an extreme of scientific skepticism that at times verged closely on credulity."--"Joseph Glanvill, Witchcraft, and Seventeenth-Century Science," MP, XXX (1932-1933), 192-193.

141 Notestein, History of Witchcraft, pp. 294-295.

142 Prefixed to the fourth edition (Oxford, 1669) was a letter from Robert Boyle, commending the translation by Du Moulin. Using the copy in the Newberry Library, I have cited the fifth edition (Oxford, 1679), which also includes a letter from Du Moulin to Boyle revealing that the translation was undertaken at Boyle's request.

143 The Divell of Mascon, Sig. A2.

144 Ibid., Sig. A2^v.

145 Ibid.

146 Ibid., Sig. A3.

147 Ibid.

148 Ibid., p. 30.

149 Ibid.

150 See Note 133.

151 Cope, Joseph Glanvill, p. 19.

152 Glanvill, A Blow at Modern Sadducism, "Preface," Sig. A[5]^rav.

153 Webster, Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft, p. 38. Cope (Joseph Glanvill, p. 100) treats Webster severely: ". . . Webster's book was both inconsistent and unimpressive. He fared no better than his predecessors when he tried to hurdle Scriptural passages on witchcraft, because they were plain for all to read, and no amount of rationalizing could change the words of the English Bible. When he came to disprove witches, he attempted to retain spirits, but in his attempt he finally reduced all the spiritual phenomena with which he dealt to pseudo-physical explanations." A mild example of Webster's inconsistencies, we may add, can be seen in his rejection of evidence for witchcraft offered by Glanvill and his acceptance of the account, or most of it, of spirit visitation in The Divell of Maseon. But this is saying no more than that Webster belonged to his times. Admitting the justice of Professor Cope's strictures, many readers, struck by the occasionally surprising modernity of Webster's utterance and effectiveness of his reasoning, will prefer the verdict of Notestein: "He was no philosopher . . . nor was he more than a country scientist, and his reasoning against witchcraft fell short . . . of scientific rationalism. That was a high mark and few there were in the seventeenth century who attained unto it He was by no means consistent but he struck sturdy blows. He was seldom original, but he felled his opponents" (History of Witchcraft, p. 298). Further: ". . . the most effective of the seventeenth century assailants of witch persecution in England. He had this advantage over all who had gone before, that a large and increasing body of intelligent people were with him" (p. 302).

154 Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft, "Preface," Sigs. a2^v-a[3]^r.

155 Ibid., pp. 39, 38.

156 Ibid., p. 39.

157 Ibid., pp. 42-43.

158 Ibid., p. 267.

159 Ibid.

160 Ibid., pp. 25-26.

161 Ibid., p. 32.

162 Ibid., p. 270.

163 Ibid., p. 267.

164 Ibid., pp. 267-278.

165 Ibid., p. 41.

166 Ibid., p. 293. Rumors had been circulated that the story of the Tedworth drummer in Glanvill's How at Modern Sadducism had been discredited, and that Boyle had disowned the story of the Devil of Mascon as "a clear imposture." Glanvill, probably in 1677-1678, wrote to Boyle asking if there were any truth in the report, and again thanking Boyle for information that the scientist still endorsed the story as a true occurrence (Boyle, Works, V, 629). For a succinct account of the Tedworth drummer, see Cope, Joseph Glanvill, pp. 13-15; Notestein, History, pp. 273-276. For Henry More's edition of Sadducismus Triumphatus, see Notestein, Op. Cit., pp. 287-290; Cope, Op. Cit., p. 101.

167 Cope, Joseph Glanvill, p. 103. Space does not permit an extended discussion of the many revisions by which More, using Glanvill's papers, completed the revision of A How at Modern Sadducism (1668) into Sadducismus Triumphatus (1681). It tried to put the story of the Tedworth drummer in convincing form, and added new material from Robert Hunt's "Book of Examination of Witches," his own record of the cases over which Hunt had presided as justice of the peace when "an hellish knot of them" was tried in Somerset in 1664 (See Notestein, History, p. 273, for account of the trial). Also added were twenty-eight other relations of witchcraft trials, apparitions, and private accounts of witches. More also added a long Postscript (pp. 19-57) dated 25 May 1678) which, concentrating on Webster's treatment of the Biblical narrative of the Witch of Endor, sought to demolish The Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft.

But the profusion of Sadducismus Triumphatus came too late. As W. E. H. Lecky remarks: "It may be the result of a controversy which has conclusively settled the question, establishing to the satisfaction of all parties a clear preponderance of argument or fact in favour of one opinion, and making that opinion a truism which is accepted by all enlightened men, even though they have not themselves examined the evidence on which it rests It is possible, also, for as complete a change to be effected by what is called the spirit of the age. The general intellectual tendencies pervading the literature of a century profoundly modify the character of the public mind. They form a new tone and habit of thought. They alter the measure of probability."--History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe, 2 vols. (London, 1865), I, 9-10. The times had altered; and if he did so dogmatically and clumsily, it was John Webster who was here the Janus-face turned toward the future.

NOTES TO CHAPTER V

¹Trevelyan, England Under the Stuarts, pp. 303-330.

²Peter Du Moulin, Vindication of the Sincerity (1679), Preface, Sigs. B-C2^v, pp. 1, 53 ff. I have examined the 1664 edition in the Newberry Library, Chicago, but since the two editions agree in substance, have quoted the 1679 edition.

³Vindication, pp. 53-57. See G. P. Gooch, English Democratic Ideas in the Seventeenth Century, 2nd. ed., supp. H. J. Laski (Cambridge, 1954), p. 25; Bishop Gilbert Burnet, History of My Own Time, 6 vols. (Oxford, 1833), I, 76, where Cromwell uses the principles of Mariana in a conversation; Merritt Y. Hughes, ed., John Milton: Complete Poems and Major Prose (New York, 1957), p. 771, n. 165.

⁴Vindication, p. 53. Because of the parallel between Jesuit doctrines and those championed by Milton in The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), Titus Oates in A True Narrative of the Horrid Plot and Conspiracy of the Popish Party Against the Life of His Sacred Majesty . . . (London, 1679) accused Milton of being in collusion with Rome by frequenting a Popish club. From this grew the fantastic and widely accepted tale that Milton was a Jesuit in disguise, a story used by Tories to discredit their Whig opponents. See the entertaining account of this legend in George F. Sensabaugh, That Grand Whig Milton (Stanford, 1952), pp. 74-75, 115-125.

⁵Vindication, pp. 53-54.

⁶Ibid., pp. 55-56.

⁷Ibid., p. 57.

⁸Ibid., pp. 59-67.

⁹Ibid., p. 59.

¹⁰Ibid., pp. 65-66.

¹¹Ibid., pp. 59-60.

¹²Ibid., p. 60.

¹³Ibid.

¹⁴Ibid.

¹⁵Roger Palmer, Earl of Castlemain, The Catholique Apology . . . 3rd. ed. (London, 1674), pp. 459 ff.

¹⁶Ibid., p. 460.

¹⁷Vindication, p. 61.

¹⁸Ibid., p. 62.

¹⁹Ibid.

²⁰Ibid., p. 63.

²¹Ibid., pp. 62-63.

²²Ibid., p. 65.

²³Ibid., pp. 64-65.

²⁴The Works of the Honourable Robert Boyle, 5 vols., ed. T. Birch (London, 1841), v, 595.

²⁵Vindication, p. 79. Cf. p. 16.

²⁶Ibid., pp. 70-78.

²⁷Ibid., pp. 78-114.

²⁸Ibid., p. 78.

²⁹Ibid., p. 115.

³⁰Ibid.

³¹There was also a Cologne edition of 1671, as well as a second edition published there in 1677.

³²Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation, I, 468-469.

³³The Politicks of France. By Monsieur P. H. Marquis of C. With Reflections on the 4th and 5th Chapters: Wherein he Censures the Roman Clergy, and the Hugonots; by the S^r. l'Orme-gregny (London, 1680).

³⁴Ibid., pp. 65-99.

³⁵Ibid., pp. 93-95.

³⁶Ibid., pp. 1-64.

³⁷Ibid., pp. 78-87. Cf. Chapter III, Note 131 supra. I have compared it to the texts in the 1664 and 1679 editions of the Vindication.

³⁸Boyle's Works (1744), V, 595.

³⁹Du Moulin (Sig. A3) describes the years in which he enjoyed Boyle's company "in amoeno secessu" as the happiest of his life, probably referring to time spent in Ireland. He cites (Sig. A3^v) Boyle's appreciation of his verse as a reason for publication.

⁴⁰The dedication reveals that Du Moulin had begun the composition of his Hymns in the mountain country of Northern Britain, but that their composition had been interrupted by the outbreak of the Civil Wars. Salmasius had reviewed the first five Hymns and encouraged Du Moulin to continue writing (Sigs. A[6]-A[7]^v). In the third book of ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, "Sylva Variorum," pp. 130-132, Du Moulin included a playfully laudatory poem "In Magni Bocharti historiam animalium." The volume Du Moulin refers to is the monumental San. Bocharti Hierozoici, seu de Animalibus S. Scripturae Compendium . . . (Franeker, 1690). I have examined the abridged edition published at Franeker now in the Library of Congress. The first edition, published in London in 1664, was entitled Hierozoicon sive bipertitum opus de animalibus sacrae scripturae. . . . For a convenient discussion of the work, see La France Prot., II (1879), 655-656. The Hierozoicon quotes an impressive muster of authorities sure to be relished by any seventeenth-century humanist, and is weighted with philological quibbles. The range of animals covered--from reptiles to rabbits--is amazing. Bochart, however, is fascinated by the humble ass, and gives five chapters (XIII-XVIII) to a discussion of the animal. Du Moulin was especially proud of his kinship with Bochart, a first cousin and son of Du Moulin's aunt Esther Bochart. For the relationship, see Archaeologia Cantiana, XV, pp. 31, 34. He warmly praises Bochart again in Clamor ad Coelum.

N.B.--In describing the various poems in ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, I have given book and page numbers.

⁴¹See Chapter IV, Note 5. It is unknown why Du Moulin happened to go to Dunkirk, aside from the account in his poem.

⁴²The angry tone of the poems, Du Moulin protests, does not really reflect his habits or disposition. He admits that their heat scarcely becomes a retiring man who hates nobody, and that he had been criticised for the poetry's inconsistency with the religious and philosophical tranquility professed in his "best-seller," A Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind. In language that closely parallels preliminary statements in Regii Sanguinis Clamor, he confesses he was overcome by a zeal for the Lord, and that the insane frenzy and perversion of justice and right by the Civil Wars made him toss aside his usual spiritual repose. He was particularly aroused, he says (Cf.

Regi Sanguinis Clamor) by the way in which Puritan criminality was cloaked under a seal for God's house and thus imputed to the Almighty himself; and by the reproach thus cast on Christ's whole church. (Sigs. F4-F[8]). Whole passages of the preface seem almost lifted bodily from Regi Sanguinis Clamor.

43-It lyeth in us, as we incline our minds, to be pleased or displeased with most things of the world. This may be exemplified in things material and of less importance, which may be presidents for things spiritual and of greater moment. One that hath fed his eyes with the rich prospect of delicate Countries, as Lombardy and Anjou, where all the beauties and dainties of Nature are assembled, will another time take no less delight in a wild and rugged prospect of high bare mountains, and fifty stories of steep rocks, as about the grand Chartreuse, and the bottom of Ardennes, where the very horror contributes to the delectation. If I have bin delighted to see the trees of my Orchard, in the spring blossomed, in summer shady, in autumn hung with fruit; I will delight again, after the fall of the leaf, to see through my trees new prospects which the bushy boughs hid before; and will be pleased with the sight of the snow candied about the branches, as the flowers of the season. This is better then to consider in deserts nothing but their hideousness and barrenness, and in winter nothing but the rheumatic weather."--Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind, pp. 82-83.

44R.G., Institutes, I, xiv, pp. 156-157.

45-The other poems in the "Boyle" group include Clifforda Nobilitas, an epideictic piece praising the virtues of Henry and George Clifford, whose family had been united with the Boyles by the marriage of Elizabeth, Countess of Cork, to Richard Boyle, Viscount Dungarvan and later Earl of Burlington (See G. E. Cokayne, The Complete Peerage of England, Scotland, Ireland, Great Britain, and the United Kingdom . . . Ed. Vicary Gibbs et al., 13 vols. (London, 1910-1940), II, 430-431; III, 569-570); lines to Du Moulin's former pupil entitled Honoratissimo Domino Carolo Baroni Cliffordo, Discipulo quondam meo dilectissimo (for Charles Boyle, Baron Clifford (1639-1694), see Cokayne, Complete Peerage, II, 431); and lastly an Epicedium Illustrissimi Henrici Cliffordi Cumbriae Comititis (for Henry Clifford, Earl of Cumberland (1591/2-1643), the Royalist general on whose death the earldom of Cumberland became extinct, see Cokayne, III, 569-570). Also consult L. T. More, The Life and Works of the Honourable Robert Boyle (London, 1944), passim.

46-The chief sources for information about Du Moulin's associates at the Cathedral are Dart's Canterbury, the DNB, and John Le Neve, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae . . . (London, 1716). Fotherby, Barker, Castillion, and Gunning all were canons of Christ Church; Gunning later (1674) was Bishop of Ely, and Castillion was Dean of Rochester. Oddly enough, Du Moulin did not compliment Dean Thomas Turner with a poem, though as his funeral sermon on Turner's death shows, the Dean had done him a considerable kindness.

47 "Poetry delighteth much, So one take little of it at once, for it is luscious meat, too much of it brings weariness and leathing. It is more delightful to read than to compose, herein like musick, which delights the hearers more than the Musicians. As then it is better to hear a set of Violins, than to make one in it, it is better to hear Poets than to augment their number. I had rather that others should make me sport, than I them."---Treatise of Peace and Contentment of Mind, p. 467. Du Moulin's sentiments on amoral poetry can be gathered from his discussion of romances, wherein he says: "Whoso will keep himself holy in body and affection, and preserve his soul serene and free from the tempest of turbulent Passion, must avoid the reading of such books whose proper office is to raise those storms in a mans blood and appetite. And I know not whether it be more dangerous to read dissolute books which make of carnal love a jigg and a matter of sport, openly showing the ordure and the folly of it; or doleful amorous fables which make of it a grave and serious study Indeed one cannot follow the fancies of Romance without straying from right sense; Neither is there any thing that makes the heart more worldly and carnal, and brings it further from God."---Treatise, pp. 227-228.

48 Francis W. Cross, History of the Walloon & Huguenot Church at Canterbury (Canterbury, 1898), pp. 133-137. Cf. Chapter IV, Note 21.

49 The letter is reproduced in Archaeologia Cantiana, XLII, 120. It is addressed to Sir Edward Nicholas, principal Secretary of State and, after detailing the rivalry between the factions, says that "because this party w^{ch} professeth conformity to the Church of England is somewhat poorer than the other & hardly able to maintain their minister [Jannon], we hope yo^r hono^r will be pleased to give his Ma^{ty} an account of this happy change, & that his Royal Zeal, will be moved to afford them those encouragements, whereby they may be strengthened in their present good way, & others of their countrymen invited to the same." Besides Du Moulin and Casaubon, the signers include Dean Turner, William Barker, John Castillion, and others.

50 Cross, History of the Walloon Church, pp. 133-137.

51 H. E. Simkins, "Ecclesiastical History, Part II," The Victoria History of the County of Kent, ed. William Page (London, 1926), II, 98-99. The Kentish clergy suffered severely during the Commonwealth. The Parliamentary ordinance of 1654 "for the ejection of scandalous, ignorant and insufficient ministers and schoolmasters had made it impossible for clergy obnoxious to the Commonwealth party to earn a living even by teaching or obtaining chaplaincies . . .," Simkins

(Ibid., p. 98) remarks. Full details of the appalling condition in which the Puritans had left the great Cathedral are contained in a document drawn up by the Dean and Chapter, reproduced in Archaeologia Cantiana, I, 94-98.

52 Ibid., p. 95.

53 Ibid.

54 Ibid., p. 97.

55 Ibid., p. 94.

56 Ibid.

57 Du Moulin, A Letter Concerning the Fines, p. 3. The document by the clergy of Canterbury mentioned above shows that collections were made with moderation, that "in charity and commiseration of the poverty of many of them ["our Tenants"] and their families, we have remitted, to some the whole, to others the greatest part, to many of them a very considerable part, of their Fines, to the foregoing of some thousands of pounds: whereof we are so farre from repenting us, that . . . we thinke our charity well bestowed"--Archaeologia Cantiana, I, 97.

58 Letter Concerning the Fines, p. 4.

59 Ibid., p. 4. Though Canterbury "was more entire than most Cathedrals in England when we came to it," Du Moulin wrote (p. 5), repairs by 1664 had cost £12,000. Destructive fanaticism lingered on, however, for on 5 October 1663 the Dean and Chapter of Rochester Cathedral wrote to its bishop, Dr. Warner suggesting that he might like to add a suitable fence around a new baptismal font, without which the font, given by Dr. Warner, would "soon become the prey of the fanatic and sacrilegious rabble." The chapter clergy had placed a wooden fence around it for protection. The original font, given in 1639, had been destroyed by the Puritans.--Arch. Cant., XLII, 121-122.

60 A Sermon Preached in the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury, October 17. MDCLXXI. At the Funeral Of the very Reverend Thomas Turner, D.D. Dean of the same Church . . . (London, 1672).

61 A Sermon Preached, p. 23.

62 Against John Durell, Lewis Du Moulin had written the Patronus Bonae Fidei, In Causa Puritanorum, Contra Hierarchicos Anglos . . . (London, 1672), in which he attacked Episcopacy and tried to exonerate the Puritans of charges of disloyalty to the Crown. There is an echo of one of Pierre Du Moulin's favorite contentions in his Jugulum

Causae, Seu Nova, Unica, Compendiaria, & una propemodum periodo, Ratio: Per quam Totus doctrinarum Romanensium complexus, de quibus lis est inter Protestantes & Pontificios; & una Papa, ejusque imperium, funditus evertuntur . . . (London, 1671). This treatise of 396 pages seeks to undermine the Papacy, chiefly by proving that it is an earthly monarchy like any other, and that it has sought to conceal its own self-aggrandisement under external show and pretensions of a spiritual power. Dedicated to Charles II, the text of the book is preceded by no less than sixty commendatory letters to such figures as the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Bridgewater, Robert Boyle, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, Edward Stillingfleet, Richard Baxter, Conrad van Buning, Isaac Voss, Henry Oldenburg, Dr. Peter Du Moulin, Sir Thomas Overbury, and to Charles Louis, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, Elector, and Duke of Bavaria. Perhaps the last work of Lewis Du Moulin deserving mention is his Moral Reflections upon the Number of the Elect, Proving Plainly from Scripture Evidence, &c. That not One in a Hundred Thousand (nay One in a Million) from Adam down to our Times, shall be Saved . . . (London, 1680). Written in the last year of his life, the work is dedicated to the Marchioness of Regne; it anticipates that Du Moulin's death is not too far off. By woefully considering the thimbleful of men that might be saved, it seeks to awaken lethargic sleepers in sin to a fervent piety.

⁶³The quotation is found (pp. 80-81) in the pamphlet bound up with A Short and True Account, entitled A True Report of a Discourse Between Monsieur De L'Angle, Canon of Canterbury, . . . and Lewis Du Moulin . . . (1679). A Short and True Account and A True Report are consecutively paged.

⁶⁴A Short and True Account, p. 4.

⁶⁵For the pedigree of the Rev. Samuel De L'Angle, see Archaeologia Cantiana, XV, 31-33. For another summary of the De L'Angle family, see Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, Index Vol., 192-194, 220-221. Agnew gives in full the will of Canon Samuel De L'Angle, Index Vol., 193-195. For a character of Du Moulin and epitome of his controversies with Stillingfleet, Durell, Patrick, and De L'Angle, see Agnew, Index Vol., 119-120.

⁶⁶A Short and True Account, pp. 71-72.

⁶⁷Ibid., p. 84.

⁶⁸Ibid., p. 71.

⁶⁹Ibid., p. 86.

⁷⁰Ibid., p. 85.

⁷¹Ibid.

⁷²Ibid., p. 83.

⁷³Ibid., p. 86.

⁷⁴Ibid.

⁷⁵Ibid., p. 84.

⁷⁶The Last Words of Lewis du Moulin: Being His Retractation of all the Personal Reflections He had made on the Divines of the Church of England, (In several Books of [his]) Signed by himself on the 5th and the 17th of October, 1680. (London, 1680).

⁷⁷Last Words, p. 4.

⁷⁸Last Words, pp. 4-5.

⁷⁹Ibid., p. 10.

⁸⁰Ibid., pp. 11-15.

⁸¹Ibid., p. 75; DNB, XIII, 1097.

⁸²Richard Baxter, A Second True Defense of the Meer Nonconformists, Against the Untrue Accusations, Reasonings and History of Dr. Edward Stillingfleet . . . With some Notes on Mr. Joseph Glanvilles Zealous and Impartial Protestant, and Dr. L. Moulin's Character . . . (London, 1681), p. 183. See also Reliquiae Baxterianae: Or, Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative of the most Memorable Passages of His Life and Times. Faithfully Publish'd from his own Original Manuscript, By Matthew Sylvester . . . (London, 1696). Despite his writing against Du Moulin, Baxter (Reliquiae, I, 110) found him to be "one of those Friends who are injurious to the Honour of their own Understandings by overvaluing me, and would have spent his time in translating some of my Books into the French tongue." Discussing Du Moulin's political writings, which he thought Erastian, Baxter said that "The good Man meant rightly in the main, but had not a head sufficiently accurate for such a Controversie" (Reliquiae, III, 85).

⁸³Cyrus Du Moulin is thought to have died some time before 1680. See biography and bibliography in La France Prot., V, 829-830; also Agnew, French Prot. Exiles, Index Vol., p. 119n; Arch. Cant., V, 35.

⁸⁴The nephew, usually known as Peter Du Moulin, Esq., is given an excellent study by K. H. D. Haley in William of Orange and the English Opposition 1672-4 (Oxford, 1953), passim. Through a "fifth column" he operated for William of Orange, Du Moulin exercised an important influence on Dutch diplomatic policy toward England. He is thought to have been a son of Cyrus Du Moulin.

⁸⁵I have counted fifteen editions in English, French, and German between 1657 and 1765. See also La France Prot., V, 825.

⁸⁶DNB, XIII, 1098; La France Prot., V, 825.

NOTES TO CHAPTER VI

¹The Latin correspondence of scholars and churchmen shows there had been considerable interest in events leading up to the wars, trial, and execution, of which the correspondence of G. J. Voss with Archbishop Laud (Chapter IV, Note 22) is a good example. Meric Casaubon also wrote to Laud. The enthusiasm which Salmasius aroused is illustrated by the Paris physician Gui Patin (Lettres de Gui Patin, Nouvelle Edition . . . par J.-H. Reveille-Parise. 2 vols. Paris, 1845), whose mentions of Salmasius are very frequent. On 26 December 1640, Patin writes A.M. Balin he would prefer Salmasius's learning and spirit to "tout ce que prétend savoir la noire troupe des disciples du Père Ignace, qui ne save que leur métaphysique, encore ne la savent-ils pas bien" (Lettres, I, 69). "O l'excellent et incomparable personnage!" he writes Charles Spon on 26 October 1643 from Paris (Lettres, I, 301). Of Salmasius's literary controversies, Patin writes Spon from Paris on 12 September 1645: "Si ce grand héros de la république des lettres alloit son grand chemin, sans se détourner pour ces petits docteurs; s'il faisait comme la lune, qui ne s'arrête point pour les petits chiens qui l'aboient, nous pourrions jouir de ses plus grands travaux, qui nous feroient plus de bien que toutes ces menues controverses Si l'on y met Aristote avec lui, c'est une bibliothèque complète" (Lettres, I, 360). Again to Spon on 14 September 1643: "M. Saumaise est ici. Je ne puis m'empêcher d'admirer la grandeur de l'esprit de ce grand personnage, qui sait tout et qui entend tout" (Lettres, I, 297). Jesuit animosity followed Salmasius into Holland; on 29 October 1644: "On dit qu'il sera ici fort persécuté par des jesuites quand il y sera." (Lettres, I, 121). Of Salmasius's death in September, 1653, at the Spa: "J'ay seulement sù que ce grand Héros des belles Lettres mourut en deux jours." (Lettres, I, 190). For a biography of Patin, see F.R. Packard, Guy Patin and the Medical Profession in France in the XVIIth Century (New York, 1925).

²For these editions, see F.F. Madan, "Milton, Salmasius and Dugard," The Library, N.S., IV, No. 2 (Sept., 1923), pp. 119-145; "A Revised Bibliography of Salmasius's Defensio Regia and Milton's Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio," The Library, 5th Series, II, No. 2 (June, 1954), 101-112. My copy is No. 4 listed by Madan (p. 105).

³The editions are listed in articles cited in Note 2. Much correspondence, books, and documents relevant to the Salmasian Controversy were covered by David Masson, The Life of John Milton, new and rev. ed., 7 vols. (London, 1881-1894), but his account suffers from being scattered among other subjects. Of generally available accounts the controversy, the best balanced is that by James Holly Hanford, A Milton Handbook, 4th ed. (New York, 1946), pp. 109-115, which is notable for its fair treatment of More. See also Hanford's John Milton, Englishman (London, 1950), pp. 166-177, which establishes (pp. 171-175) the connection between the impact upon Milton of Du Moulin's invective in Regii Sanguinis Clamor ("his first reaction on reading the Clamor was one of surrender") and his rise from the nadir, through the impassioned Defensio Secunda, to inspired recovery in the personal utterances of Paradise Lost. A similar point is made by E.M.W. Tillyard, Milton (London, 1951), pp. 184-201, who finds that "the serious beginnings of Paradise Lost are to be found in the state of mind that prompted the Defensio Secunda" (p. 196), since the two works were evidently under way at the same time. Though Mark Pattison's Milton (London, 1923) has its essential facts right, its perspective is marred by Pattison's zest for epithets. Much background material otherwise inaccessible was included by John Mitford in his "Life of Milton," prefixed to The Poetical Works of John Milton, 2 vols. (London, 1851), I, lxxviii-xciv, cixiv-cixv, cixvii-cixix, and his "Appendix" and "Addenda." Mitford, however, confuses Pierre Du Moulin and Dr. Peter Du Moulin, p. lxxvii, n. 34. In discussing Milton, Perez Zagorin, A History of Political Thought in the English Revolution (pp. 106-120) does not treat both sides of the controversy, a weakness found also in G.P. Gooch, English Democratic Ideas in the Seventeenth Century, 2nd. ed., ed. H.J. Laski (Cambridge, 1954), pp. 105, 204-207. See, however, Zera L. Fink, The Classical Republicans: An Essay in the Recovery of a Pattern of Thought in Seventeenth Century England (Evanston, 1945), pp. 101-105. Of interest are Sir Robert Filmer's comments on Salmasius and Milton in Observations Concerning The Originall of Government, Upon Mr. Hobs Leviathan, Mr. Milton against Salmasius, H. Grotius De Jure Belli (London, 1652), ed. Peter Laslett in Patriarcha and Other Political Works of Sir Robert Filmer (Oxford, 1949), pp. 251-260.

⁴I have used the copy in the Newberry Library, Chicago. The Tragicum Theatrum's connection with Regii Sanguinis Clamor will be discussed in an Appendix. See Salmasius's view of the execution as a drama in the Defensio Regia, p. 338.

⁵For an account of the various editions and translations of Bate's Elenchus, see articles by F.F. Madan: (1) "Milton, Salmasius, and Dugard," pp. 119-145; (2) "A Bibliography of George Bate's Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia," Library, 5th Series, VI, Nos. 3/4 (December, 1951), 189-199; and (3) "A Revised Bibliography . . .," p. 121 (see Note 2). I have examined the 1649 edition mentioned above, but cited the Browne edition (Madan [2], p. 191) in the Newberry Library.

⁶Defensio Regia, pp. 18-38.

⁷Ibid., p. 201.

⁸The arguments cover Chapters II-VII, pp. 38-242. The following is a sketch of some of their points: Ch. II (pp. 38-70) discusses whether there is any law, human or divine, by which the King's trial and execution can be defended. It considers by whom, by what authority, of what crime, and by what judgment Charles was condemned. It seeks to prove that a king or tyrant may do what he will, and not be deposed or executed, because he is liable to God alone. Ch. III (70-78): The teachings of the Jews, God's chosen people, enjoining obedience. Ch. IV (98-132): Shows that the practice of the primitive Church agreed with Old Testament doctrines of obedience (p. 127--the Papacy brought collision with the secular powers). Ch. V (132-171): Argues from pagan sources that the doctrine of obedience to kings was the same among Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Egyptians, Jews, Greeks, and Romans. Kingship has always been the form of supreme government by an individual. Ch. VI (171-201): A King has always possessed his own rights and powers, with reference to no other. He has always been greater than the people, and responsible to none. Ch. VII (201-242): A King has no peer or superior in the kingdom; there is no law by which to judge him (p. 219).

J. Neville Figgis, in his classic account of the theory, The Divine Right of Kings, puts the doctrine "in its completest form" in four propositions: (1) Monarchy is a divinely ordained institution; (2) hereditary right is indefeasible; (3) kings are accountable to God alone; (4) non-resistance and passive obedience are enjoined by God (pp. 5-6). The theory was formulated out of a need for a sanction which would free political life from theocracy, and make secular government "as much a part of the Divine plan for mankind as is theology or the organisation of the church" (pp. 258-259). Against Papal claims of overlordship, it was a counter theory of a separate, equal right necessarily placed in kings, partly for their prestige. "It would have failed in its object, had it attempted to give to Parliament rather than to the King the sovereignty which it denied to the Pope" (p. 257). England having refused to surrender the right and liberty of the crown even to the "splendid imperiousness of the medieval Papacy . . . It was not likely she would allow a similar claim, presented in the less lovely form of the Presbyterian discipline" (p. 198). Of Papal and Presbyterian claims, Figgis says that "opinion may differ as to which of the two systems was the more meddlesome and irritating tyranny. But there can be no doubt that, with whatever difference in degree, both are alike in kind. Each puts forward a claim by Divine Right to subject the secular power to the spiritual, to make the clergy the ultimate arbiters of political action" (p. 198). "The Presbyterian system," he points out, "while asserting national independence of Papal sovereignty, would have yet set up within the nation an organisation which would have dwarfed the State and hindered the growth of the nation's life . . . Even Independency, which seems to leave the whole matter free, implies a denial of the right of the nation as a whole to an ecclesiastical organisation. Had it ever become universal, there could not have been a single religious communion claiming to represent the nation on its spiritual side" (p. 207). For England, the Divine Right theory would have accomplished its work only when "the danger was past of a relapse into Popery or Presbyterianism" (p. 199); at the Restoration, "the last chance of Presbyterianism becoming dominant in England disappeared. The Revolution [of 1689] finally removed all danger from the side of Rome. Only then did the theory of the Divine Right of Kings cease to be useful" (p. 262).

⁹Defensio Regia, "Praefatio," p. 14.

¹⁰Ibid., p. 16. Cf. Elkon Basilike, Or the King's Book, ed. Edward Almack (London, 1904), p. 261: "When they have destroyed Me, (for I know not how farre God may permit the malice and cruelty of My Enemies to proceed, and such apprehensions some mens words and actions have already given Me) as I doubt not but My bloud will cry aloud for vengeance to heaven"

¹¹Defensio Regia, p. 329. Other references linking the Papacy and Jesuits to Puritan political doctrine are found on pp. 131, 169, 365. On Papal absolution of subjects from oaths of allegiance, about which Pierre Du Moulin, Bishop Andrewes, and James I had written against Bellarmine, see p. 133.

¹²Ibid., p. 342. Cf. pp. 333, 339.

¹³The Puritan political theorists are discussed passim in Fink's *The Classical Republicans; Gooch-Laski, English Democratic Ideas; *Zagorin, A History of Political Thought; in H. Baker, The Wars of Truth (Cambridge, Mass., 1952), pp. 246-302; J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century, pp. 247-270; Allen, English Political Thought, 1603-1660 (London, 1938), pp. 26-39, 424-448; Haller, Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution, pp. 65-99, 288-318.

¹⁴Defensio Regia, p. 36.

¹⁵Ibid., p. 179. Salmasius's discussion of the polity covers pp. 176-181. It had a strong effect on Du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Clamor.

¹⁶Ibid., Chapter VIII, pp. 242-269. In Ch. VII, pp. 201-242, Salmasius had developed the theory that the King has no superior in the kingdom, and that there is no law by which to judge him.

¹⁷Ibid., Ch. IX, pp. 289-328. Professor Zera Fink's observation on this point is worth quoting: "There were many points at issue between these two controversialists, but not the least of them was whether England was in its proper constitution a mixed state or an absolute monarchy with the indivisible sovereign power residing in the king. This was . . . a central issue of the whole controversy. Salmasius, as Milton understood him, based his case on two main points: that sovereignty is indivisible, and that it resides in the king. To prove that it resides in the monarch, Milton saw him resorting to the law of God, the law of nature, and the theory of divine investiture, and an analogy between the state and the family, if not indeed to the theory that the king is absolute as the inheritor of those divinely instituted, absolute parental rights, out of which, by way of the expansion of the family into the state, government was supposed to have originated. That sovereignty was indivisible Milton did not dispute, but to the contention that it resided in the monarch by divine and natural law, he replied with the doctrine of popular sovereignty and the social compact and with his own interpretation of the law of God and the law of nature. Salmasius's argument implied that a mixed state was the negation of all law and government. Milton replied with the flat assertion that a pure tyranny or unmixed state such as Salmasius talked about neither had ever existed or could exist. He was . . . so far from abandoning the theory of mixed government as to assert, not merely that the best governments are mixed, but that all governments can never be anything else. The central issues in the Milton-Salmasius controversy were well chosen. However absurd his argument may appear to us today, Salmasius knew what he was about, and Milton leaped to meet him on the issues which he had set."--The Classical Republicans, pp. 101-103.

¹⁸Defensio Regia, pp. 330-332. Ch. I, pp. 326-362.

¹⁹Ibid., Ch. XI, pp. 362-385.

²⁰Ibid., p. 367.

²¹Ibid., p. 369.

²²Ibid., p. 373.

²³Ibid., pp. 375-376.

²⁴Ibid., pp. 381-383.

²⁵Ibid., Ch. XII, pp. 385 ff.

²⁶Ibid., p. 417.

²⁷Ibid., pp. 379-380.

²⁸Ibid., p. 431.

²⁹Ibid., pp. 437-440.

³⁰Ibid., pp. 438-439. Cf. Note 176.

³¹Ibid., pp. 442 ff.

³²Herman Scherpbier, Milton in Holland: A study in the literary relations of England and Holland before 1730 (Amsterdam, 1932), pp. 41-43. See also Chapter III, Note 47 supra.

33 Scherpbier, Milton in Holland, pp. 39-40, 55-56.

34 E.g., Vondel's poems Grafnaelt van 's Konings Stathouder in Yrlandt (1641), on Strafford's execution; Henriette Marie Koningin van Groot Britanje, Vranckrijck en Yrlandt, t' Amsterdam, and De Hyman van Oranje en Britanje (both 1642) on the occasion of the British Queen's trip to bring the Princess Mary for her wedding to Prince William, and to seek help for the English Royalists; and for satires hitting Sabbatarians and Presbyterians in 1644.—Scherpbier, Milton in Holland, pp. 44-50.

35 Nicolaï Heinsii Dan Fil. Poemata . . . (Leyden, 1653), p. 163.

36 In his Poemata (1653), Heinsius relates the incident and reproduces the verses in his preface (Sigs. *3^v-4^v). The panegyric is found on pp. 137-138.

37 Their reactions, especially as feeling developed after Milton's replies and his attacks on Alexander More, can be found in Masson and Mitford. As early as 1639, G. J. Voss (Epistolae, I, 377) had written to Hugo Grotius deploring a feud and name-calling between Salmasius and Daniel Heinsius (the father of Nicholas).

38 Lettres, II, 418. But on 18 November 1650 Patin quotes to Falconet a letter stating that Salmasius had begun the Defensio at the request of Charles II (Lettres, II, 569-570). Other letters (I, 165, 169) merely contain information about successive editions.

39 See the sketch of Salmasius's reputation in Masson, IV, 162-165. Even such a practical politician as Cardinal Richelieu admired him as one of the three most learned men alive; and Cardinal Mazarin, unable to persuade him to return from Holland to France, sent him the order of knighthood and other honors. Masson relied substantially on the Latin biography of Antoine Clement, in Claudii Salmasii, Viri Maximi, Epistolarum Liber Primus. Accedunt De Laudibus et Vita Ejusdem Prolegomena (Leyden, 1656), pp. iii-xiii. Clement is the source for Richelieu's remark. Salmasius came from a good family of the minor nobility of Burgundy (Ibid., pp. xvi-xvii). For various honors conferred upon him, including knighthood from Queen Christina of Sweden, see Ibid., pp. xlii-liv. He was honored despite such anti-Papal, anti-episcopal books as Walonis Messalini de Episcopis & Presbyteris Dissertatio (1641) and De Primatu Papae (1645), which brought a protest from the Papal nuncio in Paris (Ibid., pp. xlvii-liv). Louis XIV, through action of the Queen Mother, gave him a non-resident pension of 6000 livres a year; see the royal diploma, Ibid., pp. lxx-lxx.

Though he championed the Royalist cause in England, Salmasius evidently had some appreciation of republicanism, for, Clement writes, "Bataviam tamen hac in parte prae Anglia praeferabat Heros noster, quod majorem semper in Republica quam in Regno libertatem esse judicaret" (Ibid., p. xli).

⁴⁰See convenient citations and occasional summaries of them in F. F. Madan's "A Revised Bibliography . . .," The Library, 5th Series, II, No. 2, 101-110, chiefly in the notes.

⁴¹Marquardi Gudii et Doctorum Virorum ad Eum Epistolae . . . et Claudii Sarrauii Senatoris Parisiensis Epistolae . . ., ed. Burmann (Utrecht, 1697), p. 203. The dates are given New Style.

⁴²Ibid.

⁴³Dated 6 May 1649. Ibid., p. 204.

⁴⁴Defensio Regia, "Praefatio," p. 7.

⁴⁵Sarrauii Epistolae, p. 224. Written 18 February 1650.

⁴⁶Ibid., p. 232.

⁴⁷Dated 9 April 1650. Ibid., p. 232.

⁴⁸Dated 12 February 1650. Ibid., p. 224.

⁴⁹Defensio Secunda, ed. Eugene J. Strittmayer^{sc} (New York, 1933), p. 12. This, as all other works of Milton cited, is in the Columbia edition.

⁵⁰The traditional verdict on Salmasius—a patriotically English one—is summed up by Mark Pattison: "Salmasius was a man of enormous reading and no judgment" (Milton, p. 106). This recalls Pattison's memorable picture—equally tart and unfair—of Pierre Du Moulin quoted in Chapter I.

⁵¹Through subsequent accounts of Salmasius have run echoes of early lives of Milton. The Life of Milton by his nephew Edward Phillips, which M. I. Hughes calls (Poems and Prose (1957), p. 1025n.) "the fullest and least unreliable of the early biographies," gives a doubly biased account; calling Salmasius "the great kill-cow of Christendom," Phillips goes on: ". . . there could no where have been found a champion that durst lift up the pen against so formidable an adversary, had not our little English David had the courage to undertake this great French Goliath, to whom he gave such a hit in the forehead, that he presently staggered, and soon after fell" (Ibid., p. 1034). The Anonymous Life of Milton, attributed to both his nephew John Phillips and Cyriack Skinner, which also (Ibid., p. 1041-1042) insists upon More's authorship

(as E. Phillips had done), sets the pace for much subsequent English criticism of Salmasius: Milton showed "better reasoning," he writes; "For Salmasius being a foreigner, and grossly ignorant of our laws and constitution (which in all nations are the respective distinguishing principles of government), either brought no arguments from thence, or such only (and by him not seldom mistaken or misapplied) as were partially suggested to him by those whose cause he had undertaken . . . Nor had he given proof of deeper learning . . . politics, while he made use of trite instances, as that of the government of bees, and such like to prove the pre-eminency of monarchy; and all along so confounded it with tyranny (as also he did the Episcopal with the Papal government), that he might better have passed for a defender of the grand Signor, and the Council of Trent, than of a lawful king and a reformed church" (Ibid., p. 1041). Such observations, especially when taken with seemingly corroborative criticism by Salmasius's enemies, have been far too readily accepted, sometimes, perhaps, because of the sharpness with which they were stated. The result has been to depress Salmasius's reputation as much as it was formerly inflated. Structurally, Salmasius could not understand the value of brevity. His position on Episcopacy and Divine Right was substantially the same as that of Du Moulin and many other Huguenots. And rather than being misapplied, his arguments from English law and history were practically the same as what George Bate and other English Royalists were saying, to say nothing of Peter Du Moulin. The argument of an alien's misunderstanding does not hold up.

⁵²Joannis Miltoni Angli Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio Contra Claudii Anonymi, alias Salmasii, Defensionem Regiam (1649), ed. Clinton W.
Keyes, tr. Samuel Lee Wolff (New York, 1932), pp. 531, 67-69.

⁵³Pro Populo Anglicano, pp. 1-10.

⁵⁴Ibid., pp. 23-25.

⁵⁵Ibid., p. 281.

⁵⁶Ibid., pp. 428-429, 13-15.

⁵⁷Ibid., pp. 458-459.

⁵⁸Ibid., p. 379. The argument of popular sovereignty is further developed on pp. 380-383.

⁵⁹Ibid., pp. 378-381.

⁶⁰Ibid., p. 393.

⁶¹Ibid., pp. 360-363.

⁶²Ibid., pp. 532-533.

⁶³Ibid., pp. 485-489, 507 ff.

⁶⁴Ibid., pp. 508-509.

⁶⁵Ibid., pp. 141, 341.

⁶⁶Ibid., pp. 44-47.

⁶⁷E.g., Ibid., pp. 24-29.

⁶⁸Ibid., pp. 36-41.

⁶⁹Haller, Liberty and Reformation, p. 106. See his discussion, pp. 102-106.

⁷⁰Defensio Regia, pp. 498-501.

⁷¹Pro Populo Anglicano, p. 505.

⁷²Milton in Holland, p. 23.

⁷³Ibid., pp. 55-56. Cf. pp. 32-40. Salmasius's Defensio Regia had been favorably received, selling 2400 copies in a fortnight by February, 1650. To suppress it had become a point of English diplomacy, for on 29 November 1649 the Council of State passed an order for searching of ships from Holland for the Defensio Regia. On 16 November 1649 (O.S.), Walter Strickland, the Parliamentary resident at The Hague, applied to the Estates of Holland and West Friesland for suppression of the book, then in press and expected to appear soon. After much debate and three attempts by Strickland, the two Estates issued on 17 January 1650 an order to suppress the Defensio, which, however, was already in wide circulation (Maden, "A Revised Bibliography," pp. 102-103). The penalty for printing, publishing, buying, or selling the Defensio Regia was forfeiture, 500 gilders' fine, or other penalty (Ibid., p. 112. See copy of the proclamation, p. 111). Because of Dutch political factionalism, Salmasius necessarily incurred unpopularity, for Leyden, where he lived, was located in republican South Holland. Holland had received Strickland diplomatically, though the Estates had refused. Whatever popularity Milton had must have been strongest in the republican provinces of Holland and Friesland. The death of Salmasius and new turns to the controversy left the matter suspended. Later references to him by Milton (Defensio Secunda, Pro Se Defensio) are to household scandal involving Alexander More, and the salacious nature of such tittle-tattle obscures what effect he might finally have had.

The astuteness of Salmasius's line of attack--the danger of the Independents, the blame that might attach to Reformed Churches favoring them, the bad odor of Charles's trial, and so on--can be seen in the way they are further amplified by Du Moulin and Milton as the controversy moves on. Consequently, though his Responsio was not published until much later (1660), Salmasius continued to exercise an appreciable influence through works following the lines he laid down.

In France, there is some evidence that Salmasius's book--perhaps because of his favoring Papists over Independents--made him some enemies, but their number is uncertain. See Masson, Life of Milton, IV, 345.

⁷⁴Clement, "Vita Cl. Salmasii," Epistolarum Liber Primus, pp. 11-111; Masson, Life, IV, 267-271.

⁷⁵Defensio Secunda, pp. 98-109. One suspects that the flattering reports reaching Milton gave rise to his extravagant praise of Christina.

⁷⁶Ethel Seaton, Literary Relations of England and Scandinavia in the Seventeenth Century (Oxford, 1935), p. 109, asserts that "The revulsion of favour against Salmasius in the Swedish Court seemed to be complete," for Christina had "cold-shouldered him" and praised Milton "as did also the learned, and the courtiers in their discourse." Her account is based partly on the Journal of the Swedish Embassy, ed. Beeve, I, 417, 439-440. Clement, however ("Vita Cl. Salmasii," p. 111) makes Salmasius's return to Leyden a matter of obligation to the University, and shows that his departure from the court was deeply regretted: "Meliori tandem valetudini redditus, cogitare coepit de reditu; Regina contra obstare, & offerre ei lautissimas & amplissimas condiciones, quo suam illi operam perpetuo addiceret. Verum obstrictus hujus Academiae curatoribus, quibus & fidem dederat se reversurum, manere ultra non potuit. Discedentem verò quanta liberalitate, quot officiis cumularit, quam aegre a se dimiserit, paucis absolvere non possumus . . ." A letter from Christina to M^{re}. Saumaise after the scholar's death (given by Clement, pp. lxxi-lxxii) is significant: ". . . vous sçavez quel estoit l'estime, dont j'honnois son merite; & vous estes temoing, que j'avois pour luy des sentimens de tendresse aussey veritables, que je les aurois peu avoir pour un Pere . . . Saumaise, que j'ay aymé comme un Pere, & dont j'honoreray toute ma vie la memoire. Je m'en souviendray toujours, & je feray voir en vous, & en ses enfans l'amitié & l'estime que j'ay portée au defunct; il ne tiendra qu'à vous de me faire sçavoir en quoy je vous favoriser, & soyez certains qu'il n'y a rien que je ne fasse pour vostre satisfaction" Three other noted scholars left Sweden about the same time as Salmasius--Friensheim, Boeclerus, and Housheron--and a letter from Gronovius on 17 October 1651 from Deventer to Nicholas Heinsius at Venice (Masson, Life, IV, 343-344) attributes the departures to either exhaustion of Christina's finances or Swedish dislike of foreigners. See Masson also IV, 345-346. There is, of course, always the Swedish weather.

One of the best compendiums of information about Salmasius is that by Mitford ("Life of Milton," lxxiii-lxxv; lxxxiv-xciii; "Addenda," clxvii-clxix; "Appendix," cxvii-ccli). A sympathetic biographer of Milton, Mitford showed discernment and fairness in his treatment of the Salmasian Controversy. With critical perception he digested many contemporary sources of importance for the controversy. His judgment on the supposed eclipse of Salmasius seems to fit the facts better than any other I have seen. He says that "from a careful perusal of the correspondence connected with this subject, I am convinced that the effect said to be produced by Milton's defense on Salmasius, and on his reputation has been prodigiously overrated" ("Life," p. lxxii, n.). The tale "that he was dismissed with contempt, or considered as defeated with dishonour, rests upon no valid authority" (Ibid., p. lxxiii). And finally: "It has been said that Salmasius lost the favour of Christina, at whose court he was residing, when Milton's answer appeared; and that his death was caused by the bitterness of his supposed defeat by an antagonist chiefly unknown. The truth of either of these assertions, too hastily assumed by biographers of Milton, is more than questionable. It is not at all improbable that the capricious Queen of the North may have vexed this old scholar with commendations of his enemy, and that she may have joined in the voice of general praise; but Salmasius left the court of Stockholm, not from the frowns of the Queen, but driven away by the severity of that iron climate" (p. lxxxvii-lxxix). His ill health and gout were notorious (p. lxx). Mitford points out that "The biographers of Milton have taken their account of Salmasius chiefly from N. Heinsius, without keeping in mind that Heinsius was his bitter and implacable enemy" (p. lxxvii).

⁷⁷Masson, Life, IV, 341-344.

⁷⁸Seaton, English Literary Relations, pp. 108 ff. The language of the epigram leads one to suspect that Wormius had seen More's dedication to Regii Sanguinis Clamor.

⁷⁹For an account of the Apologia and the reply to it by Milton's nephew John Phillips, see Masson, Life, IV, 347-348, 470-474. I have used the copy of Eikon Aklastos, which belonged to Mark Pattison, in the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington.

⁸⁰Eikon Aklastos, p. 4.

⁸¹The Responsio ad Apologiam is reprinted in the Columbia Milton, XVIII, 425-459.

⁸²See also Du Moulin's discussion of this "vehemence" in Chapter I, Regii Sanguinis Clamor (translation), and his apology for himself in ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, II, Sigs. F6 ff. It is a commonplace in seventeenth-century polemics.

⁸³The source is identified by Du Moulin as the Elenchus motuum nuperorum in Angliâ, then anonymous and later revealed to be the work of George Bate ("To the Christian Reader," translation following). The style of this epistle, by Du Moulin, and the rest of the book are consistent, contrasting strongly with the Senecan Latin of the Dedication supplied by More.

⁸⁴The Puritan government had assumed the pompous title "Custodes libertatis Angliae," which appears in Latin versions of some of its public documents. Salmasius had mocked the title in the Defensio Regia, "Praefatione," p. 12.

⁸⁵This is the theme which runs angrily through his poems in Ecclesiae Gemitus. Its preface to the reader (II, Sigs. F6-F[8]) in language and thought is almost an epitome of the arguments in Regii Sanguinis Clamor. So very similar is the style, vocabulary, and content, that a comparison unmistakably shows them to be the work of the same man.

⁸⁶Cr. Notes, 29, 30, 176.

⁸⁷Dr. George Morley (1597-1684), Bishop of Worcester (1660) and of Winchester (1662). Clarendon's sketch of him is conveniently available in Selections from The History of the Rebellion and The Life, ed. G. Huehns (London, 1955), pp. 298-299. A chaplain of Charles I, he was in exile in Holland during the Interregnum. He figures in the Salmasian Controversy as the royal chaplain, mentioned without name by Milton, who was alleged to have conveyed the hundred Jacobuses from Charles II to Salmasius for the Defensio Regia. While stoutly denying that he had received a fee, Salmasius identifies the messenger from the King as Morley in his Responsio ad Miltonum (1660), p. 23. Dr. Morley delivered the official sermon at the crowning of Charles II, A Sermon Preached at the Magnificent Coronation of the Most High and Mighty King Charles the II^d . . . At the Collegiate Church of S. Peter Westminster (London, 1661). In his latter years he wrote controversial works against doctrines of the Roman Church.

⁸⁸The excerpt from Bochart's letter mentions Jacques Moisant de Brieux [Mosantus Brosius] (1614-1674) of Caen, who had been a counsellor for the Parlement at Metz. Of the Huguenot nobility, he was educated in France and England, and was a friend of Bochart, Huet, Heinsius, and Chapelain. He was a well-known neo-Latin poet and helped organize a literary academy at Caen (Nouvelle Biographie Générale, XXIV, 778). Louis Hérauld, the son of Didier Hérauld, studied theology at Alençon and later became pastor of the Walloon Church at London, but returned to France on the death of Charles I. He resumed this post upon the Restoration, and was made a canon of Canterbury (Ibid., XXIV, 269-270). Philippe Vincent, the son of a minister at Saumur, began his career as a pastor at La Rochelle in 1626; in 1624 he was sent to England to seek help, and negotiated with Richelieu in 1628. He died in 1651 after some rather lively disputes with his colleagues about passive obedience (Biographie Universelle, XLIX, 147). Jonas Porée translated the Eikon Basilike into French in 1649; it went through at least three editions, according to the British Museum Catalogue. For David Blondel (1590-1655), the historical scholar and Reformed controversialist, see La France Prot., II (1879), 623-630. Blondel succeeded G. J. Voss as professor of history at Amsterdam, assuming the chair in 1650 and remaining there until his death. At the end of Chapter Eight of Regii Sanguinis Clamor, Du Moulin quotes his Apologia pro sententia Hieronymi de episcopis et presbyteris (Amsterdam, 1646), which seeks to prove the terms bishop and priest in the primitive Church designated the same function.

89 ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, II, Sig. A8^v.

90 The Gentlemen's Magazine, XLIII (August, 1773), 369.

91 Ibid.

92 The passage foreshadows the drift of Clamor: "And of late the most enormous actions of the English drew from Mr. Salmasius, Prince of letters, and the Honour of France, a defence of the right of Kings; God was so pleased to raise up the learnedest pen of these times to defend the best cause of the world, In which this great person hath highly honoured his Country; But to speak right, he more honoured him self, and the Church wherein he was Educated. For if hereafter these malefactors dare to be so bold, as to say the Reformed Churches approved their Actions, they shall produce this book which condemnes them, and defends the royall cause with such wisdom, and efficacy of spirit" (tr., History of the English and Scotch Presbytery (1659), Sigs. a3r^v.

93 Gent. Mag., XLIII, 369.

94 Ibid. See also the title page of Ecclesias Gemitus in ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ (1671 ed.) which dates the poem's publication in February, 1649.

95 Though space forbids reproducing a long tabulation I have made, the portion of Regii Sanguinis Clamor drawn from Bate runs, in my 12mo copy (See "Note on Translation") from pp. 3-100. The debt is greatest in Chapter Two of Clamor, which is largely narrative. In the chapter's earlier portion, Du Moulin adapts Bate freely, as is easily seen in his reworking of Bate's account of conditions exchanged during negotiations between Charles I and the Puritans. The pages that correspond are: Elenchus: 63, 64-65; 74-79; 80-83; 77; 84; 90-91, to Clamor: 37, 38; 48-49; 46-47, 49-52; 52; 56-57. As Du Moulin draws near the climactic portion of the chapter, he reflects more closely Bate's nuances and phraseology (Clamor, pp. 52 ff.). Du Moulin follows Bate closely in his treatment of the trial's aftermath, including the anecdote of the murdered soldier (Clamor, pp. 70-71; Elenchus, pp. 99-100; Cf. Milton, Def. Sec., pp. 170-171).

Because of the pervasive influence of Salmasius's Defensio Regia, a comparative tabulation with Regii Sanguinis Clamor would be a hopeless task here. The influence is too obvious to require demonstration. However, the following passages of the Defensio seem especially to have influenced Clamor: pp. 27, 29, 34-35, 138, 156, 157, (158,) 176, 227, 326, 329, 331, 333, 335, 336, (337,) 338, 341, 342, 344, 354, 355, 357, 359, 360-361, 363, 382, 392, 402, 434, 437.

⁹⁶Aside from interpolated material on Strafford and Juxon, Du Moulin follows Bate's account of the King's speech closely.

⁹⁷Glamor, pp. 75-78.

⁹⁸Glamor, pp. 80, 84-86.

⁹⁹Glamor, pp. 84-86; Milton, Def. Sec., pp. 170-177. Cf. Du Moulin's Epicidium to Juxon (ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, III, 129, ll. 35-50).

¹⁰⁰E.g., pp. 87, 94, 279, 299, 330, (337.).

¹⁰¹ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ, III, 141.

¹⁰²Nasson's account of More, and most of those derived from it, are heavily colored by Milton's charges, as supposedly corroborated by the scandal recounted in the letters of Nicholas Heinsius and Isaac Voss, which Mitford, Appendix to "Life of Milton," pp. cc-ccii, conveniently extracts. Of two responsible works of Genevan origin that discuss More's stormy career there, neither mentions personal immorality. Isaac Spon, Histoire de Geneve . . . avec Les Actes et Autres Pieces Servant de Preuves à cette Histoire, 2 vols. (Geneva, 1780), I, III, 510-511 and notes, supplies an impartial, dryly factual account of More's career which shows a gifted but provoking personality. A more detailed analysis of More is given by Jean Senebier, Histoire Littéraire de Geneve, 3 vols. (Geneva, 1786), II, 200-201, but again, no immorality is mentioned, though existence of some evidence for it would have relieved Senebier of the need to make an apology for the mistreatment suffered by More at Geneva.

¹⁰³While it is not the purpose of this study to concentrate on the quarrels of Alexander More, a reading of correspondence to, and about, More, as well as studies of his life made without partisan reference to Milton, leave one with the feeling that More has been badly wronged—even by M. I. Hughes, who re-echoes the Miltonist party line. In one place (correctly) calling More the "editor" (p. 817), and in another (incorrectly) the "author" (p. 821) of Regii Sanguinis Glamor, Hughes avers that "in 1652 [More] had just lost the chair of theology at Middleburg under a cloud which seems actually to have been as dark as Milton suggests that it was" And again: "His career in Holland had begun through the influence of Salmasius in 1651, after he had resigned the chair of Theology at Geneva in the face of serious charges of heresy and immorality. The facts on record at the time seem to support all of Milton's specific criticisms of his character . . ." (p. 821, n.). Though carefully worded, Mr. Hughes' remarks are venturesome. Because of his capacity to make enemies, More found himself, wherever he went, surrounded by enemies ready to use any means to discredit him. As a sample of how far such vicious, loose talk could go, consider Salmasius's circulation of lies about Milton's personal activities in Italy (given in Mitford, Appendix, cci-ccii).

The mania for orthodoxy is nowhere better demonstrated than in Geneva at this period, and the atmosphere in France and Holland was to some degree comparable. Senebier, an historian sympathetic to Geneva, but one who gives a Continental, not a Miltonist, view of More, apologetically cites his persecution there as a classic demonstration of the hateful bigotry of the Genevan clergy at this period, and laments that they had yielded to a mad zeal of intolerance (Histoire Littéraire, II, 195-197). Senebier aptly characterizes More thus: "Morus eut de l'esprit avec les vices qui l'accompagnaient quand la raison ne sait pas le régler; il fut léger, imprudent, orgueilleux; s'il excita l'envie par ses talens, il appela la haine par sa hauteur; son savoir étoit vaste, mais superficiel; il croyoit avoir tout fait quand il avoit montré de l'adresse ou tissé des phrases sonores" (Ibid., p. 201). Moreover, Frederick Spanheim may have seen in him a dangerous rival at preaching, and therein arose their feud. Despite Milton's charges and his editors' innuendoes, there appears nothing forced about the testimonials obtained at Geneva by More, in the sense that there was any distortion of fact in his favor. The fetid atmosphere of Geneva at this time makes it unlikely. Consequently, the documents may stand, it would seem, as a clear vindication of his life and character there.

The extent to which "orthodoxy" or "heresy" could be used to cover the hateful possibilities of human nature appears shockingly in the execution, by strangling and burning at the stake, of Nicholas Antoine on 20 April 1632, not too long before More came to Geneva. Renouncing Christianity because he could not accept thorny Trinitarian dogma, he was condemned and executed as an apostate. See full account with documents in Spon, Op. cit., I, 111, 495-499 and notes. In trying to excuse the hideous seal of the Genevans, Spon (p. 495) says they considered Antoine "comme un Seducteur pernicieux, & un parjure qui prêchoit sa fausse doctrine contre le serment fait en sa reception." The very pathetic eccentricity of his public behavior, however, makes it difficult for any but a mind calloused by theology to conceive the poor fanatic as "un Seducteur pernicieux." Such was the atmosphere in which More found himself. As he discusses the rest of More's career, Senebier gives the sanest account of his misfortunes. Spanheim, his arch-enemy, preceded him to Holland (Leyden). The baleful disposition of Spanheim may be seen, for example, in a letter (23 March 1648) from Leyden to G. J. Voss concerning More, darkly hinting that Spanheim knows how More extorted testimonials, and slighting the amiable Godefroy (Vossii Epistolae, pp. 325-326). Also writing to Voss (n.d.), Godefroy tells how More had discredited attacks "doctrinae partim sanctitate, partim morum innocentia," and praises More's character in the highest terms and with obvious sincerity (Ibid., p. 323). He is distressed at these needless quarrels (Ibid., pp. 323-324).

The letters of Sarrau reveal something of More. There are ten letters to More, from 26 December 1639 to 5 November 1649, and there are a number of letters to Salmasius discussing More. Nearly all of them contain literary chit-chat, and show Sarrau's consistent regard for More, as well as balanced judgment about him. An early letter to More, of November, 1641, reveals that More's gifts even then had drawn opposition, though he was still on good terms with Spanheim (Sarraui Epistolae, p. 36). On 5 November 1649, Sarrau writes More at Middleburg a letter of congratulation on his post there, which recalls that it was through him that Salmasius and More had met; "Nec tibi deerit Salmasius noster" (Ibid., p. 216). His letters to Salmasius contain interesting details about More's call to Middleburg through the influence of Salmasius (Epistolae, pp. 271-273), and about the testimonials granted to More. Written in the spring of 1648, the letters afford no hint that the testimonials were extorted. Generally, the letters confirm Sarrau to have been a man of good judgment, a friend but no blind admirer of More. His impression of Spanheim is worth something. To Salmasius in January, 1648, he writes, "Il est fâcheux que vous aiez encore Mr. Sp.[anheim] pour ennemi. Mais il est impossible de vivre avec cette sorte de gens sans se brouiller, si on ne se gâte avec eux, quod absit" (Epistolae, p. 272). Evidently More became part of a factional war upon going to Holland by means of Salmasius. A rumor had been circulated that he had bothered Salmasius to find him a place in Holland, and More, through Sarrau, conveyed a request that Salmasius write Godefrey at Geneva to put a stop to the tale.

Sarrau realized that More was moving into an atmosphere of bitterly squabbling professors and ministers. More left for Middleburg in July; in August, 1649, Sarrau with misgivings wrote to Salmasius: "Gratulor tibi Mori in Bataviam adventum; nunquam enim dubitavi placitum Magnatibus & populo. Utinam bene etiam illi conveniat cum Professoribus & Ministris, qui ut plurimum invident sociis praestantiorum [including Salmasius?] Sed non est vestrarum Provinciarum propria haec labes. Etiam Genevae [Sarrau was writing from Paris] & alibi haec pestis grassatur, quam prudentia, fortitudine & patientia vincere oportet" (Ibid., p. 210). With perhaps an eye to the future, Sarrau asked Salmasius on 20 August 1649, "Quid si de eo [More] vocando cogitent Amsteladamenses in locum Vossii. Sed vereor ut isti oneri par sit. Valet enim ingenio & eloquentia potius, quam multiplici & varia eruditione. Cumque unus Blondellus noster dignus est tanti viri successor" (Ibid., p. 213). More's only English biographer, the Rev. Archibald Bruce (A Critical Account of the Life, Character, and Discourses of Mr. Alexander Morus (Edinburgh, 1813), p. 22) sums it up: "Some through an excess of zeal might be disposed to carry their suspicions too far; or if personal antipathies subsisted, they could be conveniently indulged, and covered under the specious pretence of orthodoxy." Further: "As his talents were not of the ordinary sort, and as he himself did not keep within the line of cold mediocrity . . . toward others, so they, in their turn, observed no medium toward him" (p. 6).

105 Ibid.

106 The text of the letter is given in Fides Publica, pp. 19-21.

107 Writing from Westminster on 23 June/3 July 1654, Nieupoort told More that when two friends of his who knew Milton had relayed More's disclaiming letter, ". . . il avoit une impression si forte, que ce n'estoit nul autre que vous; qu'ils ne l'avoient en aucune maniere sceu dissuader, seulement qu'il leur avois requis de nous assurer, qu'il ne laisseroit rien sortir de sa plume indecent ou aucunement prejudiciable à l'Estate des Provinces Unies . . ." (Ibid., p. 20).

108 E.g., Hanford, A Milton Handbook, 4th ed., pp. 111-115.

109 Defensio Secunda, pp. 58-77. Aside from its interest for studying Milton's psychological reaction to his blindness, or as a commentary on Books I and II of Paradise Lost, the passage is also more than an inspired, involuntary egotism. It seeks to stave off the Royalist criticism that his blindness was his reward for an evil life, to draw Milton and his cause closer to the ethical inspiration of seers and prophets, and possibly to undercut hostile mockery of his blindness as being in bad taste.

110 Ibid., pp. 76-87.

111 Ibid., pp. 1-19, *13, 213, 253-255.

112 Ibid., pp. 66-77.

113 As an eloquent preacher, More delivered the funeral sermon for the Stadtholder William II. It was later translated by Daniel la Pite, rector of Woolavington in Sussex: A Sermon Preach'd at the Hague, At the Funeral of the late Prince of Orange (Father to his present Majesty King William III.) Who died in the year 1650. Wherein the Life and Actions of his Present Majesty are Prophetically foretold (London, 1694). It is the work of an adroit pulpit dramatist. There is an interesting allusion to the Stadtholder's widow, the Princess Mary, daughter of Charles I:

"But all Words fail us when we come to cast our eyes upon the desolate young Princess, young, a Widow, and with Child, and sooner a Widow than a Mother; how many Swords have pierc'd her Soul? How many calamities have beaten upon her, like so many crowding Waves one upon the back of another? What Deep hath she seen rowling over her, and ready to swallow her! Which way would you have her turn her self? To the Continent? They are not concern'd at it: To the Isles? She there sees her Shipwrack round about her, she there perceives nothing but a black Image of Death and Despair: She has nothing to direct her eyes to, but to Heaven; for she can never so little cast her eyes down to the Earth, but she finds her self obliged to groan for horror and sorrow of heart; a Mother in Banishment, a Brother in Trouble, a Father upon the Scaffold, and to fill the Measure brimfull, a Husband in a Coffin" (p. 28).

114 I have used here my own translation of the Defensio Secunda, pp. 30-33, to retain Milton's pun.

115 Ibid., pp. 33-35.

116 Ibid.

117 Def. Sec., pp. 35-37. Her name (see Hughes' ed., Poems and Prose, p. 823n.) was Elisabeth Guerret (or Gerret). The Synod of Utrecht, in a suit brought by More against her to clear his name, ruled in his favor by declaring the evidence too slight for the Leyden church to bar More from its pulpit. If, as Hughes observes, the record does not show that Spanheim had any part in the trial, it is hard to believe that he was not somewhere in the background. Bruce (A Critical Account, pp. 67 ff.) blames M^{rs}. Saumaise for the scandal. "Hag-like," she plotted with Pontia to trap More into marriage, and failing in this, stirred up accusations. The suit resulted, he says, in More's triumphant vindication.

118 Def. Sec., p. 36. I have used my own translation to preserve the word-play on More's name in the Latin couplet:

Galli ex concubitu gravidam te, Pontia, Mori
Quis bene moratam, morigeramque neget?

119 Ibid., pp. 39-41.

120 Ibid., pp. 39-43.

121 Ibid., pp. 169 ff.

122 Ibid., pp. 175 ff.

123 Ibid., pp. 209-217, 219-222.

124 Ibid., pp. 103-109.

125 Ibid., pp. 157-161.

126 Ibid., pp. 111-141.

127 Milton's sermon to Cromwell is found in Ibid. on pp. 222-233, and his exhortation to the people on pp. 239 ff.

128 Def. Sec., pp. 193-197.

129 Ibid., pp. 37, 99.

130 Ibid., p. 195.

131 Ibid., pp. 197-203, 87.

132 Ibid., p. 197.

133 Du Moulin recalls the gratitude of Charles II for Du Moulin's writings at Breda (Gent. Mag., XLIII, 369).

134 Defensio Secunda, pp. 89-91.

135 Ibid., p. 145.

136 TAPEPFA, XII, 141.

137 Ibid.

138 Ibid. There were two witnesses mentioned (unnamed) in More's answer to Milton, the Fides Publica, who knew his identity and could reveal it if asked, Du Moulin adds.

139 Ibid., pp. 141-142.

140 Ibid., p. 142.

141 If he revealed Du Moulin as the author, More must have done so after the Supplementum to the Fides Publica. Until a better explanation appears, it must go to his credit that he never publicly broke the confidence in spite of the abuse heaped on him.

142 His friends almost prophetically warned him, More says: "Tu modo conquesce, dura; non aetatem feret infelix Miltoni partus. Qui respondebis autem? Nam si responderis ut te decet ac locum tuum, convitiandi certamen detrectare videberis, ad quod ille te vocat: si verò descendes in hanc arenam, gladiator inbellis cades: provinciam cepisti duram, non artem didicisti, non calles: mendacia cumulare mendaciis, ex ruinis aliorum ad famam gradum struere; in obvium quemque grassari; gloriari non necessariò, detrahere falsò; sine fine, sine modo scurrari; verbis rem parvam magnam facere, Candida de nigro & de candentibus atra; Hae Miltono sunt artes: architectus est ille prorsus ad eam rem unicus. In eo sibi placet, se circumspicit, se jactat, coelum digito sibi videtur attingere. Tu si quid reposueris, crabronem iritaveris. Falsitati convictus perseverabit, ne videatur coepisse sine causâ: te indignas seque dignas contumelias non cessabit dicere" (Fides Publica, pp. 45-47). And so it proved.

143. . . nam si mea proprie tantum res ageretur imponere fibulam ori meo, & obmutescere poteram exemplo Domini mei: sed universus ordo noster, quem tu, licet obliquè, stigmatè notas, & Ecclesia Dei, cui mea omnia tempora consecravi, per meum petitur latus: cujus Ecclesiae tu pars aliqua videri vis, & strenuè adversum agis. Nam quid hostile magis ab ullo Ecclesiae Orthodoxae adversario designari potuit?" (Fides Publica, p. 48).

144. "Accedit quod ii qui diversum à nobis in religione sentiunt, ex ista fabula Ecclesiis nostris insultandi ansam arripiunt, quasi patiantur ipsae qualia vulgè turpia dictu sacrificulis & Pontificibus obiciuntur suis. Quos tu populo Romano ludos exhibes, dum tuum defendis scilicet? quae spectacula praebes, dum nos pro delectamento habes, & sacra nostra sannis & ludibrio exponis? quem ipsi Satanæ triumphum paras, dum scandalum creas infirmioribus, inimicis gaudium, sociis dolorem, fidei damnum, cujus interea non minus quam populi defensor videri vis?" (Fides Publica, p. 53).

145. "After enumerating such reasons as those above, ". . . propterea non utar eorum consilio, qui mihi silentium indicabant, & autores erant ne luto luderem, tibiue sordes tuas regerendo manus meas conquinarem. Nam sic temperabo stilum, ut non tam quid te, quam quid me dignum sit respiciam. Tu quidem nihil praetermittis, ut me pertrahas in hanc certaminis arenam" (Ibid., p. 54).

146. Ibid., pp. 6-7, 42-44.

147. Ibid., pp. 10-11.

148. Ibid., pp. 18-19.

149. Ibid.

150. Ibid., pp. 13-14.

151. "There was in the library of Christ Church, Canterbury, a copy of Regii Sanguinis Glamor with the Dedication "through every page of which . . . a line is drawn, and before it, in Dr. Du Moulin's handwriting are the following words, Epistola quam aiunt esse Alexandri Mori, quae mihi valde non probatur" (Gent. Mag., XLIII, 369, n.).

152. Fides Publica, pp. 31-32.

153. Ibid., pp. 17-18.

154. Ibid., pp. 47-48.

155. Ibid., pp. 59-60.

156 Ibid., p. 4. Cf. pp. 73-74.

157 Ibid., pp. 60-61.

158 Ibid., pp. 72-73.

159 Ibid., pp. 81-97, 98-109.

160 Cf. Note 103.

161 Ibid. The execution of Nicholas Antoine in 1632 showed that the frame of mind which had brought Servetus to the stake still persisted.

162 I have used the copy in the Newberry Library, Chicago. See Masson's accurate account of the edition and its contents in Life of Milton, IV, 625-634; V, 150-162.

163 Defensio Secunda (Hague ed., 1654), Sig. [†]3^r. It will be remembered that Du Moulin had sent his early poetry to Salmasius for criticism.

164 Ibid., Sigs. [†]8^{rev}.

165 See J. Milton French, "Milton, Needham, and Mercurius Politicus," SP (1936), 236-252.

166 Revelatory passages from their Latin correspondence are provided by Mitford in the Appendix to his "Life of Milton," pp. cxcix, cci.

167 Pro Se Defensio, ed. E. J. Strittmeyer^{tt} (New York, 1933), pp. 15, 37-45, 89.

168 Ibid., pp. 201-213.

169 Ibid., pp. 195-201.

170 Ibid., pp. 99-101.

171 Supplementum, pp. 206-207. Dated 11 July 1654.

172 Ibid., pp. 208-209. This is supported (pp. 210-212) by a letter of C. De Graef and Simon Van Hoerne, Curators of the Church, praising More.

173 It is published in the Columbia edition, pp. 228-295.

174 Senebier, Histoire Littéraire de Geneve, II, 200-201; Spon, Histoire de Geneve, I, III, 510-511, notes.

175^A Sermon Preached in the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury, pp. 22-23. I have used the copy in the University of Chicago Library.

176^A The portrayal of Juxon is mentioned by Du Moulin in his Epicedium, which addresses Juxon as "Magne Heros, Musâ dudum dicte pedestri," Heroâ dicende mihi moestâque Camoenâ" Du Moulin further refers to Regii Sanguinis Clamor in a marginal note in his Vindication (1679), p. 49, pointing to the fact discussed in Clamor that the Dutch had always been governed by a count rather than a King. The point was first raised by Salmasius, Defensio Regia, pp. 438-439. It was from this that Du Moulin originally took his observation.

177^A I have used the copy in the Newberry Library, Chicago.

178^A Some points are of interest as they look forward to the Whig arguments and the legend of Milton the Jesuit. Salmasius mocks Milton's assertion that the English Parliament was set up by the people, that its jurisdiction was derived from them, and that the English King was in effect only a minister of Parliament, created to do its bidding, and that the English monarchy was not hereditary (Responsio, p. 52). Will Milton dare to say, asks Salmasius, that the first reformers of the Church taught that a worthless king or tyrant could be driven out or punished freely? No, Milton gets this doctrine from the Jesuits, who teach that, if he cannot be disposed of otherwise, a King may be removed by open force or poison (Ibid., pp. 70-71).

179^A I have used the copy in the Folger Shakespeare Library, Washington. Jane remarks that as "For the Authors prophane Antagonist (John Milton, one of your Majesties grand enemies) I shall leave him under the rod of correction, wherewith God hath evidenced his particular judgment by striking him with blindness, and the Writings of the learned Author to solid and rational understandings to censure . . ." (Epistle, Sig. A2r&v).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Agnew, David Carnegie A. Protestant Exiles From France in the Reign of Louis XIV; or, The Huguenot Refugees and their Descendants in Great Britain and Ireland. 2nd. ed., corr. and enl. 2 vols. London: Reeves and Turner, 1871.

_____. Protestant Exiles From France in the Reign of Louis XIV Index Volume, with Notes, Alphabetical Tables, and Notes Introducing Memoirs of Refugees in Previous Reigns. London: Reeves and Turner, 1874.

Album Studiosorum Academiae Lugduno Batavae MDCLXIV-MDCCCLXIV Accedunt Nomina Curatorum et Professorum Per Eadem Secula. The Hague: Martin Nijhoff, 1875.

Allen, J. W. English Political Thought 1603-1660. Vol. I, 1603-1644. [Vol. II unpublished] London: Methuen and Co., 1938.

_____. A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1957.

Andrewes, Lancelot. Opuscula Quaedam Posthuma Lanceloti Andrewes, Episcopi Wintoniensis, ed. John Henry Parker (Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology). Oxford: The University Press, 1852.

Baker, Herschel. The Dignity of Man: Studies in the Persistence of an Idea. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1947.

_____. The Wars of Truth. Studies in the Decay of Christian Humanism in the Earlier Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1952.

Baird, Henry M. The Huguenots and The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. 2 vols. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1895.

Barker, Arthur E. Milton And The Puritan Dilemma 1641-1660. University of Toronto Department of English Studies and Texts, No. 1. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1942.

Bate, George. Elenchus Motuum nuperorum in Anglia; Simul ac Iuris Regii Et Parlamentarii Brevis Enarratio. Paris: n.p., 1649.

_____. Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia; Simul ac Jvris Regii Et Parlamentarii Brevis Enarratio. Frankfurt-on-the-Main: Samuel Browne, 1650.

Bates, William. Vitae Selectorum Aliquot Virorum Qui Doctrinâ, Dignitate, aut Pietate Inclaruere. London: Typis A.G. & J.P. & protestant venales Georgium Wells, 1681.

Baxter, Richard. Reliquiae Baxterianae: Or, Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative Of The most Memorable Passages Of His Life And Times. Faithfully Publish'd from his own Original Manuscript London: Matthew Sylvester, 1696.

. A Second True Defense of the Meer Nonconformists, Against the Untrue Accusations, Reasonings and History of Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, Dean of St. Pauls, &c. . . . With some Notes on Mr. Joseph Glanvilles Zealous and Impartial Protestant, and Dr. L. Moulins Character. London: Nevil Simons, 1681.

Biographie Universelle, Ancienne et Moderne, ou Histoire, par Ordre Alphabétique, de la Vie Publique et Privée de Tous les Hommes Qui Se Sont Remarqué par Leurs Ecrits, Leurs Actions, Leurs Talents, Leurs Vertus ou Leurs Crimes. 51 vols. Paris: Michaud Freres, 1811-1828.

Bochart, Samuel. Sam. Bocharti Hierozoici, Seu de Animalibus S. Scripturae Compendium Duas in partes divisum. Franeker: Johann Gyselaar, 1690.

Boyle, Robert. The Works of the Honourable Robert Boyle. In Five Volumes. To which is prefixed The Life of the Author. Ed. T. Birch. London: A. Millar, 1744.

Bradner, Leicester. Musae Anglicanae: A History of Anglo-Latin Poetry 1500-1925. New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1940.

Bredvold, L. I. The Intellectual Milieu of John Dryden. Studies in Some Aspects of Seventeenth-Century Thought. University of Michigan Publications, Language and Literature, Vol. XII. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1934.

Browne, Sir Thomas. The Works of Sir Thomas Browne, ed. Charles Sayle. 3 vols. Edinburgh: John Grant, 1912.

Bruce, Archibald. A Critical Account of the Life, Character, and Discourses of Mr Alexander Morus, A Celebrated Preacher, and Professor of Theology, &c. in Geneva and Holland; Afterwards Minister of the Church of Paris. In Which The attack made upon him in the Writings of Milton, is particularly considered Edinburgh: J. Ogle, W. Blackwood, Dickson & Easton, 1813.

Burnet, Gilbert. Bishop Burnet's History of His Own Time: With Notes By the Earls of Dartmouth and Hardwicke, Speaker Onslow, and Dean Swift 6 vols. Oxford: The University Press, 1833.

Burt, Edwin Arthur. The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Science: A Historical and Critical Essay. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner and Co., Ltd., 1925.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, of the Reign of James I. 1623-1625, with Addenda Ed. Mary Anne Everett Green. London: Longman, Brown, Green, Longman, and Roberts, 1859.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, of the Reign of Charles I. 1629-1631 Ed. John Bruce. London: Longman, Green, Longman, and Roberts, 1860.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, of the Reign of Charles I, 1635 Ed. John Bruce. London: Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts, and Green, 1865.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, 1654. Ed. Mary Anne Everett Green. London: Longman and Co., 1880.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, 1657-1658. Ed. Mary Anne Everett Green. London: Longmans and Co., 1884.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, of the Reign of Charles II. 1660-1661 Ed. Mary Anne Everett Green. London: Longman, Green, Longman, and Roberts, 1860.

Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Tr. Henry Beveridge. 2 vols. Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1957.

Casaubon, Isaac. Ephemerides Isaaci Casauboni cum Praefatione et Notis Edente Johanne Russell 2 vols. Oxford: The University Press, 1850.

. Isaaci Casauboni Epistolae, insertis ad easdem Responsionibus, quotquot hactenus reperiri potuerunt, secundum seriem temporis accuratè digestae Ed. Theodore Janson. Rotterdam: Caspar Fritsch and Michael Böhm, 1709.

Casaubon, Meric. A Letter of Meric Casaubon D.D. &c. To Peter du Moulin D.D. and Prebendarie of the same Church: Concerning Natural experimental Philosophie, and some books lately set out about it. Cambridge: William Morden, 1669.

. Of Credulity and Incredulity, In things Natural, Civil, and Divine. Wherein, Among other things, the Sadducism of these times, in denying Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by pregnant instances, and evidences, is fully confuted: Epicurus his cause, discussed, and the juggling and false dealing, lately used, to bring Him, and Atheism, into credit, clearly discovered London: T. Garthwait, 1668.

- . Of Credulity and Incredulity; In things Divine & Spiritual: Wherein, (among other things) A true and faithful account is given Of the Platonick Philosophy, As it hath reference to Christianity: As also the business of Witches and Witchcraft, Against a late Writer, fully Argued and Disputed. London: T. N. for Samuel Lownds, 1670.
- . A Treatise Concerning Enthusiasme, As it is an Effect of Nature: but is mistaken by many for either Divine Inspiration, . . . London: R. D. for Thomas Johnson, 1655.
- . A Treatise Proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, By Pregnant Instances and Evidences: Together with other Things worthy of Note. London: Brabazon Aylmer, 1672.
- . Ed. A True & Faithful Relation Of What passed for many Yeers Between Dr. John Dee (A Mathematician of Great Fame in Q. Eliz. and King James their Reignes) and Some Spirits: Tending (had it Succeeded) To a General Alteration of most States and Kingdomes in the World London: D. Maxwell for T. Garthwait, 1659.
- Cassirer, Ernst. The Platonic Renaissance in England. Tr. James P. Pettigrove. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1953.
- Charron, Pierre. Of Wisdome Three Bookes Written in French by Peter Charrō Doct^r of Lawe in Paris. Translated by Samson Lennard. London: For Edward Blount and William Aspley, [1612].
- Colomés, Paul. Pauli Colomesii Rupellensis, Presbyteri Ecclesiae Anglicanae, & Bibl. Lambethanae Curatoris Opera . . . [incl. Selectae Clarorum Virorum Epistolae] Ed. J. A. Fabricius. Hamburg: Christian Liebezeit, 1709.
- Cokayne, George Edward. The Complete Peerage of England, Scotland, Ireland, Great Britain, and the United Kingdom, Extant, Extinct, or Dormant. New ed., rev., enl. by Vicary Gibbs et al. 13 vols. London: The St. Catherine Press, 1910-1940.
- Cope, Jackson I. Joseph Glanvill, Anglican Apologist. Washington University Studies. St. Louis: Washington University Studies, 1956.
- Cross, Francis W. History of the Walloon & Huguenot Church at Canterbury. Publications of the Huguenot Society of London, Vol. IV. Canterbury: n.p., 1898.
- Colie, Rosalie L. Light and Enlightenment. A Study of the Cambridge Platonists and the Dutch Arminians. Cambridge: The University Press, 1957.

Dart, J. The History and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury, And the Once-Adjoining Monastery: Containing . . . The Lives of the Archbishops, Priors, &c. of Christ Church: With an Account of Learned Men there flourishing in their several Times London: J. Cole, J. Smith, Jeremiah Buttley, Aaron Ward, T. Edlin, Joseph Pote, 1727.

"Dr. Peter Du Moulin and North Wales." Notes and Queries, 11th Series, VII (January, 1913), 12.

Dryden, John. The Poetical Works of Dryden. New ed., rev., enl., by George R. Noyes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1950.

Du Moulin, Lewis. Automaxia: Or, The Selfe-Contradiction Of Some that contend about Church-Government, Dialogue-wise digested into a Scholasticall Discourse, betweene Religion, Reason, Prejudice and Partiality By Irenaeus Philalethes London: n.p., 1643.

. Consilium De Reformanda Ecclesia Anglicana A Christiano Alethocrito Suggestum Amplissimo Coetui, autoritate augustissimi Consensus Regis & Regni Ordinum, indicto, ad consultandum de rebus gravissimis in Religione London: Typis E. G., 1643.

. Declaratio Regnorum Angliae Et Scotiae Foedere & Armis junctorum pro vindicanda communi causa Patriae Religionis, & Libertatis, adversus sceleratam factionem Episco-papisticam. Promulgata ab utraque Camera Parliamenti Anglicani, nec non a Conventu generali Ordinum Scotiae, Anno 1644 London: Edward Griffin, 1645.

. Irenaei Philadelphi Epistola, Ad Renatum Veridaevum. In qua Aperitur Mysterium Iniquitatis novissimè in Anglia redivivum, & excutitur liber Iosephi Halli, quo asseritur Episcopatum esse Juris divini. Basle: n.p., 1641.

. Irenaei Philadelphi Epistola ad Celeberrimum virum Renatum Verdaevum, In quâ Disseritur de Motibus & controuersiis nuper obortis in Anglia, circa Religionem, & excutitur liber Iosephi Halli, quo asserit Episcopatum esse iuris Divini n.p., 1641.

. Jugulum Causae, Seu Nova, Unica, Compendiaria, & unâ propemodum periodo, Ratio: Per quam Totus doctrinarum Romanensium complexus, de quibus lis est inter Protestantes & Pontificios: & unâ Papa, ejusque imperium, funditus evertuntur. . . . London: n.p., 1671.

. Morum Exemplar seu Characteres. Leyden: Elsevir, 1654.

. Patromus Bonae Fidei in Causa Puritanorum, contra Hierarchos Anglos in quo agitur de Authoribus nuperorum motuum in Anglia. London: Typis N.B. Apud J.P., 1672.

. The Povver Of the Christian Magistrate in Sacred things. Delivered In some Positions, sent to a Friend, upon which a returne of his opinion was desired London: G. Dawson, 1650.

. Rerum Nuper In Regno Scotiae Gestarum Historia, Seu verius commentarius, Causas, occasiones, progressus horum motuum breviter & perspicue proponens, simul cum synopsi concordiae, quantum hactenus inita est Per Irinaevm Philalethen Dantzig: n.p., 1641.

. Vox Populi, Expressed in XXIV. Motions to This Present Parliament. Being the generall voyce and the humble and earnest request of the people of God in England to that most Honorable and Religious Assembly. For reforming the present corrupt State of the Church. Published by Irenaeus Philadelphus. Printed in the Yeare, 1641.

. A Short and True Account of the Several Advances The Church of England Hath made towards Rome: Or, a Model of the Grounds upon which the Papists for these Hundred years have built their Hopes and Expectations, that England would ere long return to Popery. . . . London: n.p., 1680.

. A True Report of a Discourse Between Monsieur De L'Angle, Canon of Canterbury, and Minister of the French Church in the Savoy, and Lewis Du Moulin; The 10th of February, 1678/9. London: n.p., 1679. [Bound with A Short and True Account].

. Moral Reflections Upon the Number of the Elect, Proving plainly from Scripture Evidence, &c. That not One in a Hundred Thousand (nay probably not One in a Million) from Adam down to our Times, shall be Saved London: for Richard Janeway, 1680.

. The Last Words of Lewis Du Moulin: Being His Retractation Of all the Personal Reflections He had made on the Divines Of The Church of England, (In several Books of his) Signed by himself on the 5th and the 17th of October, 1680. London: Richard Royston, 1680.

Du Moulin, Peter. Tr. The Divell of Mascon. Or, A true Relation of the chief things which an Vnclean Spirit did and said at Mascon in Burgundy, in the House of one Mr. Francis Perreaud, Minister of the Reformed Church in the same Town The fifth Edition. Oxford: Henry Hall, 1679.

. The History of the English & Scotch Presbytery. Wherein is discovered their Designes and Practises for the Subversion of Government in Church and State. [Tr. Matthew Playford.] Villa Franca: n.p., 1659.

. A Letter of A French Protestant To A Scottishman of The Covenant. VVherein one of their chiefe pretences is removed, which is their conformitie with the French Churches in points of Discipline and Obedience. London: R. Young and R. Badger, 1640.

. A Letter To A Person of Quality, Concerning the Fines Received by the Church At its Restoration, Wherein, By the instance of One of the Richest Cathedrals a very fair guess may be made at the Receipts and Disbursements of All the Rest. London: n.p., 1668.

. Petri Molinaei P. F. ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ. Poematum Libelli Tres. I. Hymni in Symbolum Apostolorum. II. Ecclesiae Gemitus. III. Sylva Variorum Cambridge: John Hayes, 1670.

. Petri Molinaei P. F. ΠΑΡΕΡΓΑ. Poematum Libelli Tres. I. Hymni in Symbolum Apostolorum. II. Ecclesiae Gemitus. III. Sylva Variorum. Huic editioni accessit mantissa aliquot Poematum. . . . Cambridge: John Hayes, 1671.

. (Sieur l'Ormegegny) The Politicks of France. By Monsieur P. H. Marquis of C. [Paul Hay, Marquis du Châtelet] With Reflections On the 4th and 5th Chapters: wherein he Censures the Roman Clergy, and the Hugonots; by the S^r. l'Ormegegny. London: Thomas Sharpe, 1680.

. Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum Adversus Parricidas Anglicanos. Hagae Comitum: Adrian Vlacq, 1652. [4^o]

. Regii Sangvinis Clamor ad Coelum Adversus Parricidas Anglicanos. Hagae-Comitum: Adrian Vlacq, 1652. [12^{mo}]

. Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coelum Adversus Parricidas Anglicanos. Hagae-Comitum: Adrian Vlacq, 1652. [12^{mo}]

. A Sermon Preached in the Metropolitall Church of Canterbury, October 17. MDCLXXII. At the Funeral Of the very Reverend Thomas Turner, D.D. Dean of the same Church. By Peter du Moulin, D.D. Canon there, and One of His Majesties Chaplains. London: Henry Brome, 1672.

. A Treatise of Peace & Contentment of Mind. By Peter Du Moulin D.D. Canon of Christs Church Canterbury: One of His Majesties Chaplains. Second edition revised and amended by the Author. London: A Clark, 1671.

. A Vindication Of the Sincerity Of the Protestant Religion In the Point of Obedience to Sovereigns. Opposed To the Doctrine of Rebellion, authorised and practised by the Pope and the Jesuites. In answer to a Jesuitical Libel, Entitled Philanax Anglicus. . . . London: I. Redmayne, 1664.

. A Vindication Of the Sincerity Of the Protestant Religion In the Point of Obedience to Sovereigns. . . . The Fourth Edition: In which more light is given about the horrible Popish Plot, whereby our late Sacred Sovereign Charles the I. was Murdered. London: [I. Redmayne], 1679.

Du Moulin, Pierre. The Anatomie of Arminianisme: Or, The Opening of the Controversies of these times (formerly handled in the Low-Countries) concerning the Doctrine of Providence, of Predestination, of the Death of Christ, of Nature and Grace, &c. . . . London: Nathanael Newbery, 1635.

. The Anatomie Of the Masse. Wherein is shewed by the Holy Scriptures, and by the testimony of the Ancient Church, that the Masse is contrary unto the Word of God, and farre from the way of Salvation. By Peter du Movlin. And Translated into English, By Jam: Mountaine. Together with a learned Treatise of Traditions, Translated by G. C. London: J. B. for Humphrey Robinson, 1641.

. Apologie Povr la Sainte Cene dv Seignevr. Contre La Presence Corporelle, & Transsubstantiation. Item Contre Les Messes sans Commvniants. Et Contre La Comvnion sovs vne Espece Derniere Edition, en laquelle est satisfait a toutes les accusations des aduersaires. [Geneva:] Mathieu Berjon, 1610.

. Bouclier De la Foy, Ov Defense de la Confession De foy des Eglises Reformees du Royaume de France. Contre les obiections du Sr. Arnoux Iesuite. Liure auquel sont decidees toutes les principales controuerses entre les Eglises Reformees, & l'Eglise Romaine Derniere Edition, Reueue & augmentee par l'Authneur. Charenton: Abraham Pacard, 1619.

. The Bvckler Of the Faith: Or, A Defence of the Confession of Faith of the reformed Churches in France, against the Obiections of M. Arnoux the Iesuite. Wherein all the principall Controuersies betweene the reformed Churches and the Church of Rome are decided. Written in French by Peter du Moulin . . . and now translated into English. The second Edition. London: Richard Field for Nathanael Newbery, 1623.

. A Defence Of The Catholicke Faith: Contained in the Booke of the Most Mightie, and most Gracious King Iames the first, . . . Against the Answers of N. Coeffeteau, Doctour of Divinitie, and Vicar Generall of the Dominican Preaching Friars. Written in French, by Pierre Du Moulin, Minister of the word of God in the Church of Paris. Translated into English according to his first Copple, by himselve reuiewed and corrected. London: W. Stansby for Nathaniel Butter and Martin Clerke, 1610.

. A Learned Treatise of Traditions, Lately Set Forth in French by Peter Du Moulin. And Faithfully done into English by G. C. . . . London: For Humphrey Robinson, 1641. [Bound with Anatomie of the Masse.]

. Lettres Des Sievrs du Moulin & de Balzac. Esquelles avec vn concert d'eloquence, ilz donnent leurs advis sur la Religion, & sur le devoir des subjects envers leurs Princes. The Hague: for Bernard Langenes, 1633.

. Petri Molinaei De Monarchia Temporalis Pontificis Romani Liber, Quo Imperatoris, Regum & Principum iura aduersus vsurpationes Papae defenduntur: . . . Et Liber Serenissimi ac Potentissimi Regis Iacobi ab Adversariorvm objectionibus, praecipue vero Roberti Bellarmini, & Cuffetelli Dominicani, vindicatur. [Geneva:] Pierre Aubert, 1614.

. Nouveauté Du Papisme, Opposée a l'Antiquité du Vray Christianisme. Contre le Livre de Monsieur le Cardinal du Perron, Intitulé Replique a la Response du Serenissime Roy Jacques I. Roy de la Grand' Bretagne. Sedan: Jean Jannon, 1627.

. "La Vie de M. Pierre Du Moulin, Ministre de l'Eglise réformée de Sedan et professeur en Theologie, écrite par luy-même." Bulletin de la Société de l'histoire du Protestantisme français, VII (1858), 170-182.

. De La Vocation Des Pasteurs. Sedan: Jean Jannon, 1618.

Du Perron, Jacques Davy, Cardinal. Harangve Faicte de la Part De la Chambre Ecclesiastique, En celle du tiers Estat, sur l'Article du Serment. Par Monseigneur le Cardinal du Perron, Archeuesque de Sens, Primat des Gaules & de Germanie, & Grand Aumosnier de France. Paris: Antoine Estienne, 1615.

. The Reply Of the Most Illustrious Cardinall of Perron, To the Ansveare Of the Most Excellent King Of Great Britaine The First Tome. Tr. Elizabeth Cary, Viscountess Falkland. Douay: Martin Bogart, 1630.

Earle, John. Microcosmography. Ed. Alfred S. West. Cambridge: The University Press, 1951.

Figgis, John Neville. The Divine Right of Kings. 2nd ed., with three additional essays. Cambridge: The University Press, 1914.

_____. Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius 1414-1625. Cambridge: The University Press, 1956.

Filmer, Sir Robert. Patriarcha and Other Political Works of Sir Robert Filmer. Ed. Peter Laslett. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1949.

Fink, Zera S. The Classical Republicans: An Essay in the Recovery of a Pattern of Thought in Seventeenth Century England. Northwestern University Studies in the Humanities No. 9. Evanston: Northwestern University, 1945.

Foster, Joseph, ed. Alumni Oxonienses: The Members of the University of Oxford, 1500-1714: Their Parentage, Birthplace, and Year of Birth, with a Record of Their Degrees. Being the Matriculation Register of the University, Alphabetically Arranged, Revised, and Annotated. 4 vols. Oxford: James Parker and Co., 1891.

_____. London Marriage Licenses, 1521-1869. Edited by Joseph Foster, . . . from Excerpts by the Late Colonel Chester, D.C.L. London: Bernard Quaritch, 1887.

French, J. Milton. "Milton, Needham, and Mercurius Politicus." Studies in Philology, XXIII (1936), 236-252.

Frere, W. H. The English Church in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I. (1558-1625). London: Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 1924.

George, Henry Augustus. Seventeenth Century Men of Latitude, Forerunners of the New Theology. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908.

Glanvill, Joseph. The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). Ed. Moody E. Prior. New York: Facsimile Text Society, 1931.

_____. Plus Ultra: Or, The Progress and Advancement of Knowledge Since the Days of Aristotle. In an Account of some of the most Remarkable Late Improvements of Practical, Useful Learning: To Encourage Philosophical Endeavours. Occasioned By a Conference with one of the Notional Way. London: James Collins, 1668.

_____. Plus Ultra, Or The Progress and Advancement of Knowledge Since the Days of Aristotle (1668). Ed. Jackson I. Cope. Gainesville: Scholar's Facsimiles and Reprints, 1958.

- . A Blow at Modern Sadducism In some Philosophical Considerations About Witchcraft. To which is added, The Relation of the Fam'd Disturbance by the Drummer, In the House of Mr. John Mompeson: With some Reflections on Drollery, and Atheisme. By a Member of the Royal Society. London: James Collins, 1668.
- . Essays On Several Important Subjects In Philosophy and Religion. London: J. D. For John Baker and Henry Mortlock, 1676.
- . Saducismus Triumphatus: Or, Full and Plain Evidence Concerning Witches and Apparitions. In Two Parts. The First treating of their Possibility, The Second of their Real Existence. . . . With a Letter of Dr. Henry More on the same Subject London: J. Collins and S. Lownds, 1681.
- Gooch, G. F. English Democratic Ideas in the Seventeenth Century. Second Edition, with Supplementary Notes and Appendices by H. J. Laski. Cambridge: The University Press, 1954.
- Greenslet, Ferris. Joseph Glanvill: A Study in English Thought and Letters of the Seventeenth Century. Columbia University Studies in English, Vol. I. New York: Columbia University Press, 1900.
- Haag, Eugène, and Émile. La France Protestante par MM. Eugène et Émile Haag. Deuxième Édition Publiée sous les Auspices de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français et sous la Direction de M. Henri Bordier. 6 vols. Paris: Libraire Sandoz et Fischbacher, 1877-1888.
- Haley, Kenneth Harold Dobson. William of Orange and the English Opposition 1672-4. Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1953.
- Hall, A. R. The Scientific Revolution 1500-1800: The Formation of the Modern Scientific Attitude. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1954.
- Hall, Joseph. Divers Treatises, Written upon severall Occasions, By Joseph Hall late Bishop of Norwich. . . . Now first collected Into one Volume, and digested in the Order designed by the Author. London: R. H., J. G., and W. H., 1662.
- Haller, William. Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution. New York: Columbia University Press, 1955.
- . The Rise of Puritanism Or, the Way to the New Jerusalem as Set Forth in Pulpit and Press from Thomas Cartwright to John Lilburne and John Milton, 1570-1643. New York: Columbia University Press, 1938.

Hanford, James Holly. John Milton, Englishman. London: Victor Gollancz, Ltd., 1950.

_____. A Milton Handbook. 4th ed. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc., 1946.

Heinsius, Nicholas. Nicolai Heinsii, Dan. F. Elegiarum Liber. Accedunt varia diversi argumenti Poemata eodem Auctore. Paris: Jean Camusat and Pierre le Petit, 1646.

_____. Nicolai Heinsii Dan Fil. Poemata. Accedunt Joannis Avtgerii, Quae quidam colligi potuerunt. Leyden: Elsevir Press, 1659.

Hobbes, Thomas. Hobbes's Leviathan: Reprinted from the Edition of 1651. Ed. W. G. Fogson Smith. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1952.

Hovenden, Robert. The Registers of the Walloon or Strangers' Church in Canterbury. 3 pts. Publications of the Huguenot Society of London, Vol. V. Iymington: Charles T. King, 1891-1898.

Hyde, Edward, First Earl of Clarendon. Clarendon: Selections from The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars and The Life by Himself. Ed. G. Huehns (Worlds Classics). Oxford: The University Press, 1955.

Jane, Joseph. Eikon Aklastos The Image Vnbroaken. A Perspective of the Impudence, Falshood, Vanitie, and Prophannes, Published in a Libell entitled Eikonoklasthe against Eikon Basilike Or the Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majestie in his solitudes and Sufferings. [London: n.p.,] 1651.

_____. Salmasius His Dissection and Confutation of the Diabolical Rebel Milton, In His Impious Doctrines of Falshood, Maxims of Policies, and destructive Principles of Hypocrisie, Insolences, Invectives, Injustice, Cruelties, and Calumnies against his Gracious Sovereign King Charles I. Made legible for the satisfaction of all Loyal and Obedient Subjects . . . London: J. G. B., 1660.

Jones, Richard Foster. Ancients and Moderns: A Study of the Background of the Battle of the Books. Washington University Studies--New Series, Language and Literature--No. 6. St. Louis: Washington University, 1936.

_____, et al. The Seventeenth Century: Studies in the History of English Thought and Literature from Bacon to Pope by Richard Foster Jones and Others Writing in His Honor. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1951.

"J.D." "Paper from a M. S. in Dr. P. Du Moulin's Hand-writing." The Gentleman's Magazine and Historical Chronicle, XLIII (1773), 369-370.

Kocher, Paul H. Science and Religion in Elizabethan England. San Marino, Calif.: The Huntington Library, 1953.

Lacey, W. E. H. History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe. London: Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts, and Green, 1865.

Le Neve, John. Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae: Or, An Essay Towards Deducing a Regular Succession of All The Principal Dignitaries In Each Cathedral, Collegiate Church or Chapel (now in being) In those Parts of Great Britain called England and Wales, From the first Erection thereof, to this present Year 1715 London: J. Nutt, 1716.

Madan, F. F. "A Bibliography of George Bate's Klenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia." The Library, 5th Series, VI, Nos. 3/4 (December, 1951), 189-199.

_____. "Milton, Salmasius, and Dugard." The Library, 4th Series, IV, No. 2 (September, 1923), 119-145.

_____. "A Revised Bibliography of Salmasius's Defensio Regia and Milton's Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio." The Library, 5th Series, No. 2 (June, 1954), 101-121.

Masson, David. The Life of John Milton: Narrated in Connexion with The Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of His Time. New and rev. ed. 7 vols. London: Macmillan and Co., 1881-1894.

Mariana, Juan. Ioannis Marianae Hispani, e Soc. Iesu, De Rege et Regis Institvione Libri III. Ad Philippum III. Hispaniae Regem Catholicum. Toledo: Apud Petrum Rodericum, 1599.

Matthews, A. G. The Works of Richard Baxter: An Annotated List Compiled by A. G. Matthews, M. A. London: Wyman and Sons, Ltd., n.d.

Miller, Perry. The New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954.

Milton, John. Complete Prose Works of John Milton. Volume I (1624-1642). Ed. Don M. Wolfe. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953.

- _____. Joannis Miltoni Defensio Secunda Pro Populo Anglicano: Contra infamem Libellum anonymum, cujus Titulus, Regii sanguinis clamor adversus parricidas Anglicanos. Accessit Alexandri Mori Ecclesiastae, Sacrarumque litterarum Professoris Fides Publica, Contra calumnias Ioannis Miltoni Scurrae. The Hague: Adrian Vlacq, 1654.
- _____. John Milton: Complete Poems and Major Prose. Ed. Merritt Y. Hughes. New York: Odyssey Press, 1957.
- _____. Ioannis Miltoni Angli Pro Se Defensio Contra Alexandrum Morum Ecclesiasten, Libelli famosi, cui titulus, Regii sanguinis clamor ad coelum adversus Parricidas Anglicanos, authorem recte dictum. The Hague: Adrian Vlacq, 1655.
- _____. The Poetical Works of John Milton. Ed., with a Life, by the Rev. John Mitford. 2 vols. London: Bickers and Son, 1851.
- _____. The Works of John Milton. Gen ed. Frank A. Patterson. 18 vols. in 21. New York: Columbia University Press, 1931-1938.
- _____. An Index to the Columbia Edition of the Works of John Milton. Ed. Frank A. Patterson and French R. Fogle. 2 vols. New York: Columbia University Press, 1940.
- More, Alexander. Alexandri Mori Ecclesiastae & Sacrarum Litterarum Professoris Fides Publica, Contra Calumnias Ioannis Miltoni. The Hague: Adrian Vlacq, 1654.
- _____. Alexandri Mori Ecclesiastae & Sacrarum Litterarum Professoris Supplementum Fidel Publicae, Contra Calumnias Ioannis Miltoni. The Hague, Adrian Vlacq, 1655.
- _____. Alexandri Mori Poemata. Paris: Oliver de Varennes, 1669.
- _____. A Sermon Preach'd at the Hague, at the Funeral of the Late Prince of Orange, (Father to his present Majesty King William III.) who died in the Year 1650. Wherein the Life and Actions of his Present Majesty are Prophetically foretold Translated out of French by Daniel la Fite, M.A. Rector of Woolavington in Sussex. London: J. D. for Roger Clavel, 1694.
- More, Louis Trenchard. The Life and Works of The Honourable Robert Boyle. London: Oxford University Press, 1944.
- Nobbs, Douglas. "New Light on Louis du Moulin." Proceedings of the Huguenot Society of London, XV (1933-1937), 489-509.

Notestein, Wallace. A History of Witchcraft in England from 1558 to 1718. Prize Essays of the American Historical Association. Washington: American Historical Association, 1911.

Nouvelle Biographie Générale depuis les Temps les plus Reculés jusqu'à nos Jours, avec les Renseignements Bibliographiques et l'Indication des Sources à Consulter; Publiée par MM. Firmin Didot Frères, sous la direction de M. le Dr Hoefer. 46 vols. Paris: Firmin Didot Frères, 1855-1866.

Ornstein, Martha. The Role of Scientific Societies in the Seventeenth Century. 3rd. ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1938.

Packard, Francis R. Guy Patin and the Medical Profession in Paris in the XVIIth Century. New York: Paul B. Hoeber, Inc., 1925.

Palmer, Roger, First Earl of Castlemaine. The Catholique Apology With a Reply To the Answer, Together with a clear Refutation of the Seasonable Discourse, its Reasonable Defence, & D.^r [sic] Du Moulins Answer to Philanax By a Person of Honour. The Third Edition Much augmented N.p., 1764.

Pattison, Mark. Isaac Casaubon 1559-1614. 2nd ed. Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1892.

_____. Milton. English Men of Letters. London: Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 1923.

Patin, Gui. Lettres de Gui Patin. Nouvelle Édition Augmentée de Lettres Inédites, Précédée d'une Notice Biographique . . . par J.-H. Reveillé-Parise 2 vols. Paris: J.-B. Baillière, 1846.

Prior, Moody E. "Joseph Glanvill, Witchcraft, and Seventeenth-Century Science." Modern Philology, XIX (1932-1933), 167-193.

Quick, John. Synodicon in Gallia Reformata: Or, the Acts, Decisions, and Canons Of those Famous National Councils Of the Reformed Churches in France 2 vols. London: T. Parkhurst and J. Robinson, 1692.

Rager, John Clement. Political Philosophy of Blessed Cardinal Bellarmine. Washington, D. C.: Catholic University of America, 1928.

Robertson, The Rev. Canon J. Craigie. "Canterbury Cathedral, A.D. 1660." Archaeologia Cantiana: Being Transactions of the Kent Archaeological Society, X, 94-98.

- Sarrau, Claude. Marquardi Gudii et Doctorum Virorum ad Eum Epistolae . . . Et Claudii Sarraui Senatoris Parisiensis Epistolae . . . Ed. Peter Burmann. Utrecht: Apud Franciscum Halman, Gulielmum vande Water, 1697.
- Saumaise, Claude de. Defensio Regia, Pro Carolo I. Ad Serenissimum Magnae Britanniae Regem Carolum II. Leyden: Elsevir, 1652.
- . Claudii Salmasii, Viri Maximi, Epistolarum Liber Primus. Accedunt, De Laudibus et Vita Ejusdem, Prolegomena. Ed. Antoine Clément. Leyden: Adrian Wyngaerden, 1656.
- . Claudii Salmasii Ad Johannem Miltonum Responsio, Opus Posthumum. London: Thomas Roycroft, 1660.
- Scherpbier, Herman. Milton in Holland: A study in the literary relations of England and Holland before 1730. Amsterdam: H. J. Paris, 1932.
- Schultz, Howard. Milton and Forbidden Knowledge. New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1955.
- Seaton, Ethel. Literary Relations of England and Scandinavia in the Seventeenth Century. Oxford: The University Press, 1935.
- Selden, John. The Table-Talk of John Selden. Ed. S. W. Singer and W. S. W. Anson. London: George Routledge and Sons, Ltd., n.d.
- Senebier, Jean. Histoire Littéraire de Geneve. Par Jean Senebier, Ministre du St. Evangile & Bibliothécaire de la République. 3 vols. Geneva: Barde, Manget & Compagnie, 1786.
- Sensabaugh, George F. That Grand Whig Milton. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1952.
- Shaw, William A., Ed. Letters of Denization and Acts of Naturalization For Aliens in England and Ireland, 1603-1700. The Publications of The Huguenot Society of London. Lymington: Charles T. King, 1911.
- Simkins, M. E. "Ecclesiastical History, Part II." The Victoria History of the County of Kent, ed. William Page, II, 25-111.
- Smith, Gerard, S.J. Jesuit Thinkers of the Renaissance: Essays presented to John F. McCormick, S.J., by his students on the occasion of the sixty-fifth anniversary of his birth. Milwaukee: Marquette University Press, 1939.

"Some Seventeenth Century Letters and Petitions." Archaeologia Cantiana, XLII, 117-127.

Spon, Isaac. Histoire de Geneve, Par M^r. Spon. Rectifiée & augmentée par d'amples Notes. Avec Les Actes et Autres Pièces Servant de Preuves à cette Histoire. 2 vols. Geneva: Fabri et Barrillet, 1780.

Sprat, Thomas. The History of the Royal-Society of London, For the Improving of Natural Knowledge. London: T. R. for J. Martyn and J. Allestry, 1667.

_____. History of the Royal Society. Ed. Jackson I. Cope and Harold Whitmore Jones. St. Louis: Washington University Studies, 1958.

Stephen, Sir Leslie, and Sir Sidney Lee. The Dictionary of National Biography. 22 vols. London: Oxford University Press, 1937-1938.

Stephenson, Carl, and F. G. Marcham. Sources of English Constitutional History. A Selection of Documents from A.D. 600 to the Present. New York: Harper Brothers, 1937.

Stuart, Charles (King Charles I). Elkon Basilike, Or The King's Book. Ed. Edward Almack. London: The De La More Press, 1904.

Stuart, James (King James I). An Apologie for the Oath of Allegiance. First Set Foorth Withovt a name: And now acknowledged by the Author, the Right High and Mightie Prince, James, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britaine, France and Ireland; Defender of the Faith, &c. Together with a Premonition of his Maiesties, to all most Mightie Monarches, Kings, free Princes, and States of Christendome. London: Robert Barker, 1609.

_____. Declaration Dy Serenissime Roy Iacques I. Roy de la Grand' Bretaigne, &c. deffenseur de la Foy. Povr le Droit des Rois & independance de leurs Couronnes. Contre la Harangve de l'Illystrissime Cardinal du Perron, prononcée en la chambre du tiers Estat le XV. de Ianuier 1615. London: John Bill, 1615.

_____. The Political Works of James I, Reprinted from the Edition of 1616. Ed. with Introduction by Charles Howard McIlwain. Harvard Political Classics, Vol. I. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1918.

_____. Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus. Or An Apologie For the Oath of Allegiance, Against the two Breues of Pope Pavlus Quintvs, and the late Letter of Cardinal Bellarmine to G. Blackvel the Arch-priest. London: Robert Barker, 1607.

Svendsen, Kester. Milton and Science. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1956.

Sykes, Norman. Old Priest and New Presbyter: Episcopacy and Presbyterianism since the Reformation with especial relation to the Churches of England and Scotland. Cambridge: The University Press, 1956.

Tallmadge, G. Kasten. "Juan de Mariana," in Jesuit Thinkers of the Renaissance, ed. Gerard Smith, S.J. (q.v.). Milwaukee: Marquette University Press, 1939.

Tillyard, E. M. W. Milton. London: Chatto and Windus, 1951.

Tragicum Theatrum Actorum, & Casum Tragicorum Londini Publice celebratorum. Quibus Hiberniae Proregi, Episcopo Cantuariensi, ac tandem Regi ipsi, Aliisque vita adempta, & ad Anglicanam Metamorphosin via est aperta. Amsterdam: Jodocum Janssonium, 1649.

Trevelyan, George Macaulay. England Under the Stuarts. London: Methuen and Co., Ltd., 1949.

Venn, John, and J. A. Venn, Eds. Alumni Cantabrigienses. 6 vols. Cambridge: The University Press, 1924.

Voss, Gerard Johann. Gerardi Joan. Vossii Et Clarorum Virorum ad Eum Epistolae, Collectore Paulo Colomesio Ecclesiae Anglicanae Presbytero Londini nuper editae, Nunc accuratius recusae . . . Augsburg: Sumptibus Laurentii Kronigeri, 1691.

Wagner, Henry. "A Contribution Towards the Pedigree of Du Moulin." Archaeologia Cantiana, IV, 34-37.

_____. "Pedigree of De L'Angle." Archaeologia Cantiana, IV, 31-33, 37.

Webster, John. Academiarum Examen, Or the Examination Of Academies. Wherein is discussed and examined the Matter, Method and Customes of Academick and Scholastick Learning, and the insufficiency thereof discovered and laid open; As also some Expedients proposed for the Reforming of Schools, and the perfecting and promoting of all kind of Science. Offered to the judgements of all those that love the proficiencie of Arts and Sciences, and the advancement of Learning. London: Giles Calvert, 1654.

. The Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft. Wherein is affirmed that there are many sorts of Deceivers and Impostors, and Divers persons under a passive Delusion of Melancholy and Fancy. But that there is a Corporeal League made betwixt the Devil and Witch, Or that he sucks on the Witches Body, has Carnal Copulation, or that Witches are turned into Cats, Dogs, raise Tempests, or the like, is utterly denied and disproved London: J. M., 1677.

White, Andrew D. A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. 2 vols. New York: D. Appleton and Co., 1896.

Willey, Basil. The Seventeenth Century Background: Studies in the Thought of the Age in Relation to Poetry and Religion. London: Chatto and Windus, 1934.

Wolf, A. A History of Science, Technology, and Philosophy in the 16th and 17th Centuries. 2nd ed., by Douglas McKie. London: George Allen and Unwin, Ltd., 1950.

Zagorin, Perez. A History of Political Thought in the English Revolution. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1954.

APPENDICES

APPENDIX A

A POSTSCRIPT ON SALMASIUS AND MORE

Whatever difficulties might have existed between Salmasius and Alexander More concerning the alleged seduction of Bontia, More remembered the great scholar with some affection. A skillful writer of neo-Latin verse, More published, sixteen years after Salmasius's death, a volume of familiar poems, Alexandri Mori Poëmata (Paris, 1669). Feeling, perhaps, that the dead scholar's reputation could still enhance his own, More inserted (p. 121) some brief elegiacs by Salmasius entitled "In Effigiem Viri Summi Alexandri Mori Theologi & concionatoris Eruditissimi." The volume also includes two poems by More in elegiacs praising Salmasius: "In Effigiem Illvstris Viri Clavdii Salmasii" (pp. 121-122), and "Claudio Salmasio" (pp. 123-124). Possibly inspired by the fine engraving of Salmasius prefixed to Clément's edition of his letters, the first poem to Salmasius was written after his death and recalls the honors which Queen Christina had paid him. The second poem hyperbolically praises the Defensio Regia, and was evidently composed shortly after the Defensio's publication in 1649.

Milton fostered, in his Defensio Secunda and Pro Se Defensio, the legend of a serious estrangement between Salmasius and More over Bontia. Since Mme. Saumaise plainly disliked More, she doubtless would have enjoyed such a situation. But More's inclusion of these verse panegyrics in his volume of poetry suggests that there was no permanent breach, and that More had only the fondest memories of his one-time sponsor.

APPENDIX B

PETER DU MOULIN AND THE TRAGICUM THEATRUM (1649)

Besides the Defensio Regia of Salmasius and the Elenchus motuum nuperorum by George Bate, the year 1649 saw publication of another book about the English revolt, the Tragicum Theatrum Actorum, & Casuum Tragicorum Londini Publice celebratorum, sometimes (erroneously) attributed to Peter Du Moulin. The book has been discussed in Chapter VI, pp. 199-200. A comparison of the Tragicum Theatrum with relevant portions of Du Moulin's Regii Sanguinis Clamor, and with an acknowledged source for Clamor, the Elenchus of Bate, shows that, on grounds of style and probability, the Tragicum Theatrum was not written by Peter Du Moulin. Among other things, the Tragicum Theatrum provides a full Latin translation of Charles's scaffold speech. Comparison of even a portion of the speech in its versions from Bate, Du Moulin, and the Tragicum Theatrum shows that Du Moulin adapted Bate's Latin with relatively little change, and that for vocabulary, structure, and style, their Latinity is far closer than that of Du Moulin and whoever wrote the Tragicum Theatrum. Bate (Elenchus (1650 ed.), p. 102) gives the opening of the King's speech thus:

Nihil vobis coram jam dicerem, nisi Silentium meum in reatûs argumentum traherent nonnulli, Neq; existimarent eâ conscientiâ crimina exprobrata in Me admittere, quâ patientiâ poenae succumbo.

Innocentiae meae testem Deum invoco (prae cuius Tribunali brevi sistendus sum) mihi nunquam in mentem venisse iuxta Parlamenti Privilegia imminuere, neque prius Exercitum conscripsisse, quam Illi hostiles in Me Copias parassent; quod, è Coeptorum utrinque ordine & Diplomatum Programmatumq; fastis, inquirenti liquide constabit.

Interim agnosco, & demississime amplector Justitiam Divinam, quae per iniquam hodie Sententiam justum mihi inflixit supplicium, quod olim innocentem Virum (Hiberniae Pro-Regem intelligebat) liberare noluerim, cum iniquissimo Decreto opprimeretur.

Du Moulin (Glanor, pp. 74-75) adapts it to this:

Maluerim coram vobis premere, nisi metuerem ne silentium meum in reatus argumentum à nonnullis traheretur, & supplicii patientiam verterent in criminum obsectorum conscientiam.

Innocentiae meae testem Deum invoco, ad cuius tribunal brevi sistendus sum, mihi nunquam in mentem venisse iuxta Parlamenti Privilegia imminuere, neque non ante exercitum conscripsisse, quam illi hostiles in me copias parassent; quod quidam rerum gestarum ordinem, & Diplomatum Programmatumque Fastos perquirendi, liquide constabit.

Interim agnosco, & summâ animi subjectione veneror

Divinam Justitiam, quae per iniquam sententiam justum mihi infligit supplicium, quod innocentem Virum non liberaverim cum iniquissimo judicio opprimeretur.

Here, however, is the account in the Tragicum Theatrum (pp. 186-188;

I have omitted material not mentioned by Du Moulin or Bate):

. . . Equidem tacere possem, nisi vererer, ne multi ex silentio meo conjecturam facturi essent, me criminum, quorum accusatio mea mentionem facit, conscium esse.

Verum meas esse partes arbitror profectas ex debito, quo Deo & Patriae me obstrictum novi, ut me virum integrum, Regem bonum, & Christianum verum praestem, & me talem esse toti mundo re ipsa patefaciam. Primum ab innocentia mea sermonem meum exordiar, quanquam ut multis eam declarem non opus est, utpote quae toti terrarum orbi satis innotuit, Nemini autem hominum ignotum est, Deum cui ratio mihi reddenda est, testem invoco, quod bellum hoc Parlamenti mei debellandi causa non susceperim, nec toto meae vitae curriculi illud privilegiis suis denudare enixus sim Saepe numero enim Deus Sententia injustè pronuntiata justum judicium exercet, quod ità velim intelligitur, me injusta sententia Hiberniae Proregem condemnari permittentem nunc iterum injusta Sententia morti adjudicari. Eò usque innocentiae progressus sum.

Aside from this evidence, circumstances make it improbable that Du Moulin wrote the Tragicum Theatrum which, along with Bate's Elenchus, appeared in 1649, as we have seen. Du Moulin was evidently at work on Clamor ad Coelum in 1651, for he was writing "nunc triennio ferme post patratum facinus, ne res sicariorum, heu nimium prospere fluentes, & divinae vindictae mora, infirmis animabus aliquem flagitii assuetudinem inducant" (Clamor, "Lectori Christiano," Sig. A[11]r). If he had really composed the Tragicum Theatrum, when he wished to quote the King's speech, Du Moulin would much more probably have used a convenient and available translation of his own, than have gone to the needless trouble of adapting Bate's version. There is also the fact, noted above, that the King's speech in the Tragicum Theatrum includes material not found in the Elenchus. Wishing to display the martyr King to the best advantage, Du Moulin, if he had composed this account, would perhaps have retained it so that the King might speak at more persuasive length.