1997

Keeper of Fire: An Original Manuscript of Poetry

Cheryl Alfrey

Follow this and additional works at: http://trace.tennessee.edu/utk_interstp2

Recommended Citation
http://trace.tennessee.edu/utk_interstp2/5 Keeper of Fire

an original manuscript of poetry by

Cheryl S. Alfrey
In The Circle of Madness Walk to Krutch Park

seventy four degree March fish schools swirl the pond in the shallows whirl in slimy kaleidoscopes stretching for the deep the carp keep them cornered and they dance never-ending patterns of survival

Krutch Park shade away we watch a man on a bench struggle with himself rock with shaking hands reaching, reaching

"what do you think he's reaching for"

"something that isn't there" Leslie

I dreamed about my church organist last night, the one we had until I was eight. I was so little then, but now I know she was the age I am now.

Hollowed out eyes and stringy brown hair against pale skin, she comes to me, doling out waffle cone sundaes; but she is one short, and I am the one left.

She wears a bright red boa with a rose sticking up from her shoulder, growing beside her head.

Gives it to me with apologetic eyes, draping me in a tickly shroud I'm not sure I deserve.

I wake crying, call Daddy collect at work; "tell me everything you know about Leslie Rawles."

He is surprised, hadn't thought of her in years, says she was a little, mousy girl, lived with her mom in a trailer because her father was an alcoholic.

I tell him I know it sounds strange but I have to know: was there a flood? I seem to remember rising water. He gasps, awed at my eight year old mind's uncanny ability to know secrets then whispered out of earshot; "well, come to think of it, her trailer flooded and everything was ruined."

There's one more thought heavy in my throat but I have to know why I know, why she gave me that boa. "Was there some kind of controversy? Did the church fire her?" Daddy's not even breathing now and I force the rock out of my throat: "Daddy, was she mentally ill, too?"

His sigh is heavy as the weight of my dream and I cry into the phone, knowing. bald, naked men chase me through corridors -- if only
they had wings,
I could be divinely blessed rather than mentally ill -- but my men are just men -- staring, reaching to touch me
to take me --
I doubt it's to heaven explosion...

blood-brain heat-ache imprisonment, loss... the taste in the mouth, of capsules, plastic, maybe yellow, maybe black, filled with white powder, so bitter, oh so bitter against the blandness of pain
this used to be hunger, a nauseating tickle
now a symptom, something deeper than need controls me

face falls heavy, diaphragm thuds
I'm aware of things
I can't understand or control, only experience, feel

as physical,
the twinge
in my side, the hum
in my head, the yearning

for release
Dirty

here I go, pissing in the bathtub again; cleanliness is so elusive -- I am constantly bathed in the stench of myself -- I find pubic hairs in the stubble on my legs, toe jam in my ears --

I am not clean,
just rearranged.
Manic

head pulsing pounding racing scorched eyes color-blurred, I stumble savage toward release with flinging, shrieking, beating, tearing hair and skin and poetry

howling madman severing sticky tentacles of pain, of howling hell inside the brain, the chant resounds "You are insane; you think you God, yet are inane" I wither, cower, melting shame, I fall to puddles, snorting Earth slammed from a far too lofty perch look on my destruction, havoc wreaked maniacal laughter crescendos to screech,

"Shackle me,
I am free!"
mental ward

everyone's got a story here that sterilized linoleum can't make pretty cheezed out christian-heads check vitals a ritual three times a day got to keep these corpses up and running they chuckle through xanex smiles raiding the candy factory medicine room after doling out the valium sing rise and shine and give god your glory and your blood at 5 a.m. then it's march to the grub room, can't have suicidal people starving, now can we?
dead bugs splatter head-pounded windows and it's hard not to hate them, lucky bastards when it's nothing but swallow and purge and drain and crash for the rest of us rotting on blue carpet too clean to be real, too bright to be natural, too short to be lethal there's a pill for everything, and the faster our heads fry the sooner we can get home to the safety of guns Outgrabling

I've watched Alice in Wonderland ten times this week.
I should be writing, but everything in me hurts.

I see my wasted face in the mirror, fourteen pounds deader than two weeks ago, and I want to go through that looking glass to another side, outgrabling all this pain with the mome raths.
They know about pain, point to paths that get swept away.

I watch the film like it's scripture, wondering what it takes to get to Wonderland.
The torture

I know

as love
In the Endtimes

I thought this was the time of solitude, of rest for tomorrows, but they came with the news; Doggie is down in the road

I run barefoot, crusty-eyed to the place, Doggie a blur against deep crimson asphalt, eight huge pupils pleading for an answer the young men stand huddled, waiting for God but I've been here before, know there will be no answers but our own, and stoop to grapple eighty three pounds of elastic flesh, tan fur blood-matted, swelling red head lolling; for a moment I am Atlas, holding a world in my arms in the back of the pick-up, I watch the man watching Doggie; wild blonde curls whipping a face twisted and bewildered; I can't stop staring at the face that is seeing God, glowing with longing, and terror; the rest is a blur. I hold the oxygen mask, but can barely meet the luminous wet black eyes, begging me to be a Messiah; I see no God here, only pain. My head lilts and my bowels heave as I give the word.

Why can't I be strong when it matters? I crumble toward the waiting room as other gods take over. I can't be with you in the end, in this hour of need.

Back at home it seems like a dream until my friend says, "You have blood on your mouth. Go wash." I am stained from temple to waist, deep red drying brown and then black on the first white shirt I've worn in years, my reminder of my weakness, of God's weakness, of ominous black eyes wet with the weight of worlds.
the day he told me the affair had not ended

I can mark the day to the hour, to the minute, the glass shattered, crusty flower petals falling to dirty linoleum. The pressure had been building for a year, since the day my skin touched his skin touched your skin in sparks of friction, growing bloody as months lolled on full of rubbing and biting and lies. I thought I could preserve the flower, pressed between paper and glass, but flowers are weak, friendship is weak when roots are smothered in dirt and dirty sheets. It's seed-spreading time; not his in you, or his in me, but ours, my sister, we are scattered like sand in the hurricane, doves to the wolves. I bite my lip and smile at the thought of it, the carnage we have lured ourselves into, the blood on my tongue from my lip, from your thighs, from our hearts. I shatter, like glass.
I'll be picking pieces out of the cat food for days, slivers festering in my feet where I have danced on the explosion of our love. Now we are splintered, like the ice in my voice on the telephone across distances that cannot be bridged, like the walls in our home he has splintered with fists intended for me, like the dingy boxes in your heart where you hold amputated bits of people, trying to make wholeness from their pain.
I have broken into a thousand pieces for you, each too small to be held any longer, each too sharp to be touched by your needy fingers. We are this to each other, and nothing more:
the sting of skin against skin, the scream of glass against membrane, the shrapnel of love we carry deep inside, like a memory of pain.
Sister-lover

Sister-lover, our blood runs too thick.

It chokes me when I swallow you, sopping up our past with a rubber tongue full of holes, stained green-purple from slapping with sharp words.

I'm too prickly to be touched that way, the way you touch the skin that touches me.

I should have been the oldest child not the clingy, dependant one hungry for a playmate. I swear these dolls were mine before you came, and I treated them like babies. I watch you run over their soft, fleshy bodies with the wheels of your chaotic tricycle, doll hair in your hands.

I fear for the bloody day.
the training wheels come off.
Early Blossoms

planting marigolds with Mother in early spring, we openly delighted at the sight of the first bloom.

"Cheryl, look, we have an early blossom" we danced barefoot on the walkway cheerfully denying that the early blooms were always the first to die

it was the same when I turned ten, started my period as breasts began budding

"you are an early bloomer, Cheryl" she told me as we picked out My First Bra at Tots 'n' Teens

it was not until I faced my peers that I first learned of early death, rejected by all the girls in my class because every boy wanted to be my boyfriend, to touch the blatantly curvaceous body that still held the mind of a child who wanted to be invited to sleepovers and liked for the blooms in her heart not for a blossom budding between thighs, plucked too early for survival now my peers have risen to spring, grown flowers of their own to destroy but as I watch frail heads bend toward pain, I hear roots ripping from soil Second Grade Playground

second grade playground
recess gets seedy whirlybirds poking the back pressed flat by five little boys playing wishbone touching where panties go even then, there were heroes: Charlie, all black eyes and tan rebel fist splattered with blood he would never tell why he hit those boys none of us would ever tell the reason

how could we explain why it happened
every day?
Stranglehold distance,
I stretch too far to touch without choking you, grabbing with sharp fingers and words

I saw a nature video:

mother cat wooling
her babies to death, licking,
rubbing with vigor, dragging perfect bundles of ecstasy to safety, unaware her love was danger

sparrow smothering her babies when they hatched too soon, her need to give warmth unequivalent to their need for freedom,
instinct gone mad with compassion

chimpanzee carrying the corpse of her child for weeks, rocking it in her arms, suckling it at her engorged, neglected nipple, unable to accept the limpness of its form, the stillness of its breath, that the child was gone and she couldn't save it

I wonder if that is how I will be, clutching your heart until it bursts, dragging your body through years of denial,
propping you up at the breakfast table, cradling your coldness to my skin at night,
trying crazily to give you the warmth I think you need, the warmth that has killed you, the torture I know as love Dialogue

glass hurricane gleaming on warm cherry -- you send your spirals around the room and words fall, shatter, on dirty linoleum;

go to bed so I can sweep up the pieces.
Weeping Willow

when daddy died, the willows wept, but deeply rooted as they were, where years ago he'd spread their seeds, could not attend the funeral.
for the woman whose love could save me

I see your flesh and I sweat.
Doesn't matter if it's an elbow,
        knuckle, nape of neck dripping salt.
You read poetry,
    hushed whispers of your soul.
The world falls in love with you, and God is a smoky bar.

At night I strip naked cool, pressed sheets, contemplate skin
the sting of your heat against my incurable coldness.

Why can't I get warm, close, without cringing?

My ex-lover tells me he wants you and my coldness grows pressed flat on my stomach uncaring weight on my back.

This isn't love.

Tension exploding into my pain, I lie closer than death to him skin inside my skin, and feel empty.
Dreams and Visions
Falling Asleep

face flat pressed mattress grids sheets can wait I'm leaving night flight seizes body sighs me out backward arc through rooftops, rushing to newness, spine-suspended in starlight

I remember childhood slept on my back star patterns in my eyelids
I only had to blink to see them waiting
to take me

now sleep is my phantom

I chase its shadow in search of vision
Drives Me

Anger drives me careening down a one-way street.

I try to steer, remember
which pedals to push,

but I can't drive stick shift for shit so I let Anger drive me.

She manipulates that lever like it's autoerotica and smiles,

eyeliner cracking at the corners of maniacal, crusty slits of euphoric blindness.

I love her.
In the Circle of Women

There are women in my dreams:
bare-breasted and laughing, they want me to teach the songs and dances. We touch as I form their movements and smile, sun-scorched and alive.

Cheyenne approaches, childlike, our nakedness melting together, fronts of bodies pressed softly, identical brown hair trailing behind.
Her small hands trace the curve of my woman-hips, flat chest pressing my motherly bosom.
I am not ashamed
caressing perfection, wanting her tiny form in unmotherly ways, topless women whirling by in endless circles.
Keeper of Fire: for Jennifer Vasil school of streets

I am grounded in stone cobbled roads and castle ruins festival faces cartwheel by none of them familiar

I love it here lights strung shimmering from sky dripping paper lanterns a rush of blond surrounds me comfort, you lead me a seat high in the castle wall you remind me of Stacy in London freedom-friend in unfamiliar paradise fireballs roll from your hands through slats of iron

"there, that should keep us warm" this is your home where you swing the gate and tend fire sitting in a cafe in New Orleans, having lunch with some musical child genius high school hero soulmate of my lover slips me through the crowded room eases me against his shoulder we sit down to have a few beers, you reminisce about life in the small town Bible belt horse shit, turns out the hero's repulsive, opposed to my Feminist agenda so I just smile at my lover growl at the man grapple the options...

seated in a beanbag chair floor of someone's jazz bar, I touch my lover's arm, feel it tingling with excitement over me, over that god-like hero, over physical friction and groupy-groped embraces, we revel in talk of sex, domination, the mysteries of manhood, elegant-idiotic tone and diction, and I melt in the love for my lover's adoration for another Voice

Let me scream with the voice of a mad bitch, a wolf yelping, unafraid of the power of the moon.

Let me slide naked in water, outside in front of pale, shocked boys who die, wanting me.

Let me walk the rocky underground of ex-lovers, grinning, "it reminds me of hell, but I like it," as I trample them.

Let me grasp the terror of vision and barely survive, lick total surrender and make it home.
Night Music

I wake to find
Bob Dylan
cross-legged on my comforter, corroded acoustic propped on end like a cello, gnarled fingers plucking crusty scabs, warm breath tinged with pomegranate spilling across my bosom.

he winces, warbling incoherent poetry,
and I struggle to rise up, to grasp his nonsensical genius, but he says,

"Lay back, baby,
I'll sing for you and all that,
But just you don't go pushing me, Y'hear?"

I've heard this before, and the words crawl across me a live tarantula.

I wake,
for real this time,
spider bite throbbing over my heart.

Cheryl S. Alfrey

Quote from Dylan's "A Blast of Loser Takes Nothing" in Tarantula.
Anger Dance

dream dogs eat each other in twilight my slit eyes defining shapes where one ends and the other begins which teeth match which fur

I want to dive into that stranglehold until nothing else remains lose myself in fury naked feet on linoleum, bathwater running,

pours an unstoppable stream, splashes from green ceramic into blue-grey puddles, it overflows, wasted

you sit on the toilet reading comics
as I wriggle from my jeans exposing thighs and breasts and skin, skin, skin smooth, like porcelain

why won't you look at me?

outside the window glowing faces of the nativity scene which haunted me through Christmas have turned away from the road to file silently back into the barn from which they emerged in early November, green and red and blue plastic shining like the spotlights of unwanted voyeurs now grown bored with their Virgin prey, returning to darkness.
Flood:

Chronicles of Family bathwater spirals sucks buttocks
I'm a child on the drain there are no bubbles here like the flood in Leslie's trailer all alcohol and tears

"we had to let her go she missed so many days" like Eddie's body beating dam the Ohio River car on the bridge extinguish running, door open wide wide gape of a mouth at the center of oceans Jody drowns, leaving children and names no longer hold her

I am a hand reaching above the tide

Flood
Black eyes, black hair lashes long, curled lanky frame, swanky walk I think I loved you before I knew the meaning, followed in adoration, searched for hidden smiles that seldom came and faded fast, washed like your face in waves.

The next to last day of second grade I decided to die, tired of piano lessons, afraid of dreams flying through air in waking hours, and voices of darkness.

I ripped a page from my Trapper Keeper, wrote out a will giving everything to you if only you'd come home, missing six months, your face imprinted in my pillow where I'd tried to smother myself.

That night, the phone rang as I shoved away a full plate: chicken continental, peas, bread, carrots, heart bursting out my throat, "don't answer it, we're eating" but no one listens to little girls so no one ate that night.

They found your car bridging the Ohio, your emaciated body sloshing the dam, face rubbed off by rough water, pillow covers where I rested that night, my head in the cleft of your chin, thin shoulders shining at the foot of my four-poster bed, whispering "goodbye, goodbye, goodbye."

I missed the last day of school, sat in Mamaw's house while they buried you, because Mama said, "people who commit suicide don't go to heaven, Cheryl."

I saw that echo in her eyes last year, crouched by my side in the hospital when I swallowed pills to find my way back to you, Eddie, back to someone who understands, whose face-print lingers in my pillow, shoulders hovering at my feet whispering, always whispering, begging me to find a way to live without drowning.
Three a.m. ghosthouse, deaf grandmother's breathing chokes the clock's ticking.

I saw the skeleton of the farm today, grandfather's bones that have no headstone, and a suicide cousin who has whispered my name from the ground for fourteen years. I never could sleep in this town, with that train wailing through my window, and bullets stacked in the closet in shoeboxes. I used to fumble through them with shaky fingers, hoping I wouldn't get caught so close to death. Now the ammo is gone, camped with Uncle Homer in a schoolbus by the river where Eddie jumped the bridge to freedom, head full of drugs and dreams. Mamaw thinks insanity comes from "doing dope," not from God; I wonder what she'd think if she knew me.
Grandfather's Ground

this place whispers stories a red pick-up that eats thumbs red clay tilled by hand-tamed horses sprouts of green turning brown and tall to be hung like the effigy in the tree garden that called to the crows but frightened children

I remember my first taste of persimmons on your mountain Wayne smiling, "try them, they're delicious" and the burning bitter rush of sour seed that lingered for days filled my mouth by your casket now the world is unravelling the arsonist neighbor burned down your father's house uprooted your fence to dig a well on all that is left of you

I know you are Cherokee, but I am generations removed from words that make sense my mouth bleeds to defend what cannot be owned the sweet rush of your ripe fruit fades leaves a mouth full of bitterness Christened Virgilla Jo Alfrey in a too-small house in Kentucky, you had to run from the sticks that beat you in the night, the madness that chased you through streets and husbands.

You were only sixteen when you ran away, left an attic full of Nancy Drew books I pawed for years, searching for bits of you hidden in mysteries you dog-eared and loved, but not even Caroline Keene could make sense of your story.

You never even knew Mom was pregnant when you left, would never know the gold-haired, tortured child who asked each night, "Dad, tell me about Jody;" never know there's a name for the illness you bear and a name for the niece you never met and a name for you that still ends with All Free.

You tried to shed your heritage, Virgilla, the name that echoed the name of your father, but the "V" chased you like clubs against your skin, madness tangled deep between your roots and mine.

Valerie, I want to know you as more than just Jody, want to show you the path that leads home.
Endless Spring

Balmy autumn on the porch swing overlooking the garden, leaves tumble down, down as I cup my hand around flame.

Mom tells me not to smoke, it's stupid, will end up killing me after lingering, black-lunged, cancerous suffering.

I squint and smile. Both sides of my family live well into their nineties, and I'm not sure I want to be around that long, I say.

Autumn is a hard time for mothers. It's hard to watch leaves jump from trees like cousin Eddie leaping the bridge over the Ohio at twenty two.

Mother dreams of endless spring, thinks I am a dogwood, all pink petals and neon green buds.
Never mind the twisted branches and the roots strangling my own trunk. I flip my filter far.
Smacked by a middle finger, it soars over the flowerbed to red, cool earth.
Childhood

fields of cotton sway in the green shag carpets of childhood nurseries, Daddy's voice floating skyward carrying milkweed blossoms and wishes, and our heartbeats merge in a drowsy embrace reminiscent of ticking clocks and musty attics, and a pale Siamese cat slinking through shadows to wail with the voice of a child
Mother

Birth is an act of separation:
Light from darkness,
Earth from heaven,
Land from water --
I lost the largest part of myself
And clung blindly to it For years --
The warmth of Mother,
The scent of Mother:
I returned to that womb
So many times
Only to be delivered again
And again
Through the pain of Separation,
Creation,
Alienation --
It's all the same

Now my loneliness is Liberation:
I discover the warmth of myself,
The scent of myself -- The placental moisture that Anointed my head now Pours down my thighs,
Calls the world to my womb -- She clings to me
And I hold her aged beauty, This childless mother, this Motherless child --
It's all the same
sweet, honeyed embraces and

Healing
Boy of beauty, with Painted eyes and scarlet Lips, let me lick the wounds that Made you you, let me touch the Scars of erotic fervor, the Jagged gape of wounded flesh that First aroused your blood, let me Hang myself on your cords of nourishment, Caress the mischievous smile, the Flashing eyes of youth, the country Meadows hidden in your voice past Gravel lanes, weeping willows, and The sweet smell of juniper on your Breath, let me kiss the shattered Bones of your soul, ease out the Glassy shrapnel of cold collision, suck Away the placental moisture still Clinging to your naked skin, and Deliver you cruelly to a new world Of cool mud between the toes, liquid grass Against the spine, sweet honeyed Embraces and Healing.
learning to live with explosion

It seems simple enough; he met her at a party. I was home vomiting, trying to remember why people like food, remembering the tomatoes I ate from my garden until I was ten, unable to digest anything else.

I struggled with my bowels, he struggled with his testicles both of us trying to keep inside what the world has taught us to hold.

He will see her again when my bowels bleed.

Sometimes we have to explode.
From the rave bar to Trafalgar Square huffing poppers sucking a nitris cigarette shapes saunter by and I am beautiful

a hit on the tongue
a hit on the tongue
babes slip tongues into my ears mushrooms in my fingers she is in the stalls hash drool dripping down her face

the dress she pissed on we are out of here up the road with strangers safe benches in Trafalgar Square she passes out

I smoke some dope at the foot of a statue of a lion

I know the guards will come I just don't care when running back became running forward funny how our ending begins back in the same bed dreaming of fractures

I say I shouldn't be here waking up in grey matter while you scribble scorpions but nothing makes distance so tangible as two heads on one pillow

you dress for work, I put my clothes back on and check my messages

our letting go a series of discrete indiscretions and bipolar communion after dark you say you don't know who you are, and I bite my tongue to keep from biting yours ease you gently to your pillow and slip away before my leaving becomes a circle power we could have owned so, it comes to this beginning with words once scrawled to begin endings, suicide note still tucked inside the panty drawer the silk g-strings are mine, yours the irony of cotton-poly blend in the shack I shared with the lover we shared our panties knotted in the drawer of a boy who doesn't wear underwear, tell me why is he always at the center of our embrace makes me want to wish my fingers to daggers want to be beyond this, but your eyes only meet mine in the revolving door of his bordello

so, it comes to this

us marching on, leaving him clutching our undies won't need them where we're headed safe marriages and dark street corners sisterhood getting soggy under spike heels of oldest professions and we both want to be writers, but what's left to say that isn't blatantly exposed by your photos, his hands

Art always told us real poetry ends with insight, but what can we possibly have learned from spreading our legs closing our minds to power we could have owned

I count my losses, but don't care anymore who comes out ahead, we already know he's holding our hearts in our panties but I've learned I can live without both

so, it comes to this Whirlwind

I walked the dark, cold alley tonight, searched for bits of dust left rising from the momentum of your last movement away from me.

My house is cold.

I crank the thermostat until my biceps are as taut as my nipples, listen to the laughter outside, grind my cigarette to cinders, grind my teeth until I taste blood.

I want you to teach me your fine art of subtraction, explain how a boy afraid of heights learns to let go and leap so easily.

My psychiatrist tells me I don't know my own needs, but when I look for them I hate what I've become, huge, sucking lips hungry for something invisible.

My healing comes as a whirlwind, lifts me from the flood, but leaves me dizzy. I stagger from the strangeness of familiars to the familiarity of strangers.
Iktomi

sticky black spider hairy web weaver

I avoid pearly threads shining red eyes in night forests I know a phallus from a weed, an old woman from a rapist, I am schooled in trickster ways

but Iktomi creeps formless form becomes all we are afraid to fear the sister in bed with your lover the rapist in bed with your daughter the wrinkle in the center of your mind we are all tangled in the unbroken webs of black spiders

what can we do but laugh
Song for Blue

my heart is full

so warm, it tickles thudding in spirals color of your name

where have you been my whole life?

perfect brother, I was waiting for you, begging my parents to have a son early bloomer like me, seeker of symbols, wild with the lunacy of the moon screeching through darkness skin crawls with realness of memory, warm baths in the evening

running cloudy-eyed through night-grass tormenting fireflies

little brother sneaking to my bed after hours to hear my stories, my dreams claim your flesh and I am not alone

I Know How to Get What I Want

wrapped in army green you teach me to scream 82nd Airborne doesn't impress me you have a parachute and a big gun

strong, silent, meaningless knife in my crotch gets me nowhere anywhere but here would be better

rob my local convenience store bombs you taught me to build you can keep your sexist t-shirt I'll take whatever fills my hunger you can keep the change bitch and whore aren't unfamiliar just strange in your mouth but my throat is wide open I remember what you taught me I'm still screaming they all say they love you when they're inside you

-Oprah

I crave honesty like dark, bitter chocolate and coffee taut, prickly man to bear his soul and skin without apology or promises of stranglehold emotion,

"relax, let go, this means nothing, I want nothing but the moment" as he eases me from clothing, shackles, brutality of sex that promises the impossible: simultaneous orgasm, perfect fit, love that lasts past morning.

In the driveway, mom questions my opinions of fidelity, chastity. Fidelity's great, I say, but chastity is the stupidest thing I ever heard.

She's unimpressed with my answer, married at eighteen for the permissable sex she swears she hates. Would have believed her if I hadn't looked for pantyhose

Sunday morning without knocking, seen closeness so involved it made me vomit, and we all skipped church, feeling unholy and awkward.

Now even fidelity slips away, choked by embraces that crave variety. I ask Dad, because he seems more human, have you ever cheated? He answers a wistful no.

Why not? "Because your mother would kill me." Why do you say that? "Because she told me, and she meant it." Morality isn't on my side.

Jason says he cheated because I'm too good.
Loving you is like loving Jesus, he complains.

Sorry, but I'm not flattered. Just lonely, searching for clear blue eyes that lock into mine, tell me with a smile, I'm just going to get off.
Basket Song

I found a basket in the dumpster, beautiful woven rim with no bottom, two weeks ago, when my own life bottomed out, and rescued it exchanging my sack of dirty cat litter with the hungry trash heap, a promise of mending on my lips.

But my own threads began to unravel as I stretched to hold everything: became guardian to a homeless crack addict and brought him into my home, befriended a schizophrenic neighbor whose husband beats her nightly, offered to help friends who had betrayed me, turning my heart into a fountain of forgiveness, stared at the stains growing in my lover's bed until I broke and burned the mattress, forgot how to digest food and collapsed as i.v. tubes grew from the tops of my hands.

The basket lay forgotten by my doorstep until it decided to enter my dreams:

I am weaving a bottom for the basket, then a cover made of colored threads.

I braid my way to the side of the circle and see the basket has sprouted a spout, become a watering can.

Undaunted, I weave a cover for the spout as the voice of the basket rises, flows through weaving fingers:

"It is not enough to heal me -- you must make me useful and adorn me, as well."

I wake on the couch, medicine man pouch swinging around my neck, cats who have adopted me sitting at my feet;
they file silently into my lap one by one as a blessing.

There is work to do.

I rush to my back yard, past the basket, and grab a hoe, digging an earthen circle for planting:
sweet pea, alyssum, cantaloupe, catnip, parsley, peppermint, summer savor.

It is healing time.