TAYLOR TRIVIA: What member of the College of Law's library staff was not allowed to register for the fall term due to overdue library books? Answer to last month's Taylor Trivia: Not only did the College of Law faculty and staff enjoy the food and music at the annual UT picnic in August, but several staff members played bingo and won nifty gifts. The best winner by far was Teresa Peterson, Business Office, as she bingoed with enthusiasm, authority and grace. Her voice tone was perfect, her move to claim her prize was swift, and her appreciation of the moment was delightful.

Voices from the Legal Clinic

UT legal clinic to aid non-profits

by Marti Davis

A new legal clinic, which provides services exclusively to non-profit groups, has been started by the University of Tennessee College of Law.

Ten third-year law students will provide legal services to five East Tennessee agencies this fall, making possible several new projects.

Ann Barker, a visiting professor at the law school, has been hired to oversee the new clinic.

Most law school clinics provide services to individuals who can’t afford to hire a lawyer. The services UT’s new clinic offers will aid several new projects being undertaken by Knoxville and Knox County agencies on behalf of the poor.

For instance:

• The Community Design Center, a non-profit agency on Highland Avenue in Knoxville, is planning a 26-home subdivision for first-time buyers. The project is off Washington Pike between Broadway and East Towne Mall. The property, which was vacant, was purchased under favorable terms from the university.

Other support for the project includes grants from the city, the Episcopal Diocese of East Tennessee and the Tennessee Housing Development Authority. The law students will draw up contracts with buyers, builders and lenders.

A TVA architect, J. Michael Barker, designed the homes along with the design center’s staff architect, Jean Creswell. First American Bank is providing favorable financing so monthly mortgage payments can be set at $275 to $375 for two-, three- and four-bedroom homes.

Construction is expected to begin late this year with the first buyers moving in next summer or fall, said Annette Anderson, coordinator of The Design Center. The Metropolitan Planning Commission is reviewing the plans.

• A two-student legal team working with the Tennessee Industrial Renewal Network will produce a brochure on the rights of employees who lose their jobs through plant closings.

• The Knoxville Homeless Coalition has a team of two law students investigating alternatives to the current system used by recipients of Supplemental Social Security income checks. Many of the homeless now assign a friend or family member to be custodian of their checks.

The law students may try to determine the legal possibilities for setting up an agency to act as payee for the homeless person’s income.

• The Knox County Task Force on Domestic Violence is looking at ways to waive the prepayment requirement for battered women who are seeking court-ordered protection. In Knox County, the $45 court cost is only waived in cases of utmost poverty: a monthly income of $142 monthly for a family of two. In Nashville and Memphis, the fees are $75. The law students will be trying to define criteria for waiving court fees for protection orders. The students may then suggest how the waivers might be implemented so treatment is standard statewide.

• Law students will help the Lonsdale community define the legal rights in cleaning up and rebuilding on vacant and deteriorating property in their neighborhood. The Lonsdale improvement program is being funded by the Appalachian Community Fund.

From their clinic work, Barker expects students to gain valuable experience in law that does not deal directly with litigation as well as to recognize the benefits of public service law.
