Dear Doctor Morgan—

I thought to write you a few lines while in Canada—also to "tread then" about you!—maybe you did not get a full account of Mr.'s speech and welcome in Brown University which is referred to me.
Dear Mr. Brown,

I am writing to express my gratitude for your kind gesture in dedicating the new building to Mr. Brown and his wife. It is a lovely tower, and I believe it will be a beautiful addition to the city.

I am also pleased to hear that the building will have a historical marker with a brief history of the place. It is a fitting tribute to both Mr. Brown and his wife.

I hope this letter finds you well and that all is going smoothly.

With warmest regards, hope and ideals take shape, things become uniquely worth having and fighting for.

"We are not breaking faith with you, but we are breaking faith with the institution. Although you do not take to yourselves the whole institution, we are. We are absolutely convinced that they are supreme and worth while." And with that, another senior speaker, a young man who had been a student at the college, came to the microphone. It was clear that he felt a great deal of affection for the institution, but he couldn't help but see the difficulties that the faculty and administration were facing.

"It is our job to study, but we are not the only ones. The students, the teachers, and the administrators all have a role to play. We must be willing to work together to make this a better place."

The audience applauds as the speaker finishes his remarks.

"I hope that you will remember this advice as you go through your studies. Remember that you are not alone, and that there are many people who care about the institution as much as you do."

The meeting ends with everyone shaking hands and saying goodbye.
President of University of Tennessee City.
